PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 98th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, September 26, 1983

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Even as we thank You, O God, for this new day and week, and for Your manifold blessings and promises, we place before You the concerns of our hearts. Give encouragement and hope to any of anxious spirit and may the certainty of Your presence give peace to every person. O God, may the magnificence of Your creation and the power of Your Word give us courage for the tasks before us, today and every day, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 771. An act to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act related to health promotion and disease prevention, to provide for the establishment of centers for research and demonstrations concerning health promotion and disease prevention, and for other purposes; and

S. 1872. An act to increase endowment funds for eligible individuals under part C of title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE MUST MAINTAIN A PRESENCE IN LEBANON

(Mr. BRITT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, those of us in Congress greet the news of a cease-fire in Lebanon with a deep sense of relief. But this pause in hostilities also calls for deep reflection upon our proper role in that war-torn country. I feel the United States and other members of the multinational force must maintain a presence in Lebanon to allow the divergent national groups—the Christians and Philangists, the Druze, the Shiites, and other factions—to reach accommodation through negotiation and not through the end of a gun barrel.

At the same time, we must recognize that the limits of our participation are to keep the peace. We must not so closely aline ourselves with one party or another that we become embroiled in a civil war whose origins are deeply rooted in history. Neither can we tolerate intrusion into the internal affairs of that wounded nation by Syria or other foreign nations.

Finally, we must protect our Marines by every force at our disposal.

While cease-fires in Lebanon often are notoriously short, our hopes and prayers should be that Lebanon be allowed to emerge from its tragic situation as a unified nation and begin its long process of healing. Today that is our greatest hope for peace in the Mideast.

A COMMENDATION TO THE PRESIDENT

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, we rejoice, with all civilized mankind, at the news the weekend brought of a cease-fire in Lebanon. American diplomacy seems to have been a key element in the search for peace, and President Reagan can be sure of the support of Congress for these continuing efforts.

The President is to be commended also for the tone and substance of his remarks to the United Nations this morning. In particular, he has made a nuclear arms control offer which offers the hope of a real breakthrough.

Mr. Reagan's willingness to consider nondeployment of new intermediate-range missiles in Europe, in return for Soviet concessions in the balance of missiles globally, is a serious and thoughtful approach. I would suggest, too, that a concrete offer of a several-month moratorium on Pershing missiles deployment in Europe might both reassure our allies and encourage a Soviet response.

As Mr. Reagan told the United Nations, "We must do everything we can to make diplomacy triumph." This is true of Central America, of the Middle East, and of the other trouble spots of the world. Now is the time for deeds to follow words in the search for peace.

CHALLENGE GRANT AMENDMENTS OF 1983

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 1872), to increase the endowment funds for eligible individuals under part C of title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. ERLENBORN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and it is not my intention to object, but I make this reservation for the purpose of yielding to the gentleman from Colorado, for an explanation of the bill under consideration.

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I would tell the gentleman from Illinois that S. 1872, as passed by the Senate on Friday, would expand title III, part C of the Higher Education Act to permit use of Federal matching funds to be used to begin or to build an institutional endowment. This legislation improves the part C, challenge grant portion of title III, by establishing a three-way partnership between the Federal Government, the institution, and the private sector. This partnership will help colleges develop institutional endowments which will contribute to the long-term growth and financial stability of title III eligible postsecondary institutions, including many of the Nation's historically black colleges, community colleges, and smaller private institutions.

This landmark legislation enjoys the support of the administration, many of my colleagues in the House, and the higher education community.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the American Council on Education to Chairman PAUL SIMON of the House Postsecondary Education Subcommittee be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The letter above referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION,
DIVISION OF GOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS,
Washington, D.C., Sept. 23, 1983.

Hon. PAUL SIMON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, Committee on Education and Labor, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE SIMON: We understand that the House will soon vote on S. 1782. This is to express support of the bill on behalf of the higher education community.

S. 1782 would permit developing institutions which receive Challenge Grants under Title III of the Higher Education Act to use them to match contributions to their own endowment. Eligible institutions are relatively small colleges serving large numbers of low-income and disadvantaged students, and without substantial endowment resources.

The bill is consistent with HR 2144, the House version, and with the purposes of the existing law. It would not require additional federal spending. We urge passage of S. 1782, on behalf of:

American Association of Community and Junior Colleges.
American Association of State Colleges and Universities.
American Council on Education.
Association of American Universities.
Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities.
Association of Jesuit Colleges and Universities.
Association of Urban Universities.
Council of Independent Colleges.
National Association for Equal Opportunity in Higher Education.
National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.
National Association of Schools and Colleges of the United Methodist Church.
National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

Sincerely,
CHARLES B. SAUNDERS, JR.,
Vice President for Governmental Relations.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I wish to join the gentleman from Colorado in urging passage of the Challenge Grant Amendments of 1983.

The proposed amendments in their present form incorporate provisions requested by the administration. Certain of these are designed to provide financial safeguards so that we can be sure that Federal funds made available under this legislation are used appropriatly.

What we would authorize today is a small program with a good purpose and promising potential for greatly enhancing the development prospects of struggling institutions of higher education. Institutions eligible for assistance under title III of the Higher Education Act are relatively small and serve disproportionately large numbers of low-income and disadvantaged students. Many of the institutions are our historically black colleges and universities, and community, and junior colleges.

For the most part, they are limited in their ability to attract students, to engage outstanding faculty, to offer diverse curricula and to acquire adequate financial resources. Title III assistance has helped them overcome these handicaps as they seek to strengthen their financial stability and strive for academic excellence.

The basic problem addressed by this legislation is that most of these institutions lack a broad base of financial support. They have limited or no endowments. Colleges without endowments need some form of stable financial support so they can weather hard economic times or other uncertainties that lie ahead. Briefly, what this legislation would do is, by making available a 1 to 1 matching endowment grant, provide a catalyst for effective fundraising. The Federal matching grant will be the means by which these institutions can better generate contributions and compound their own limited and restricted resources.

The bill does this by expanding the scope of the current challenge grant program to encompass matching endownment-building Federal grants. From the sums already available for challenge grants—we are talking about a total of $9.6 million in fiscal 1983—the Secretary of Education would be authorized to award up to 20-percent endowment grants to eligible institutions to establish or increase an endowment fund. Beginning the following year all part C funds would be used for endowment grants.

The bill requires that grant funds be invested in income-producing activities that a regulated insurance company may invest in under State law. These are generally low-risk investments such as certificates of deposit, money market funds, stocks and bonds, and Treasury bills. In order to enhance the rate-of-endowment growth, there are limitations on the amount of interest income that can be spent, and during the 20-year endowment period the principal or corpus of the endowment fund cannot be touched. There are repayment provisions to cover any instances of improper withdrawals. Another desirable feature of the bill is the assurance required that matching funds represent totally new money available to the institution for the first time as a result of the Federal matching grant.

Mr. Speaker, these specific assurances, conditions, and requirements which must be satisfied under the provisions of this bill protect the Federal investment and will improve financial incentives for endowment growth.

The amendment would also raise by $4.8 million the total authorization for title III for fiscal year 1984, as requested in the President's budget. In addition, it would increase the authorization for Howard University for the next fiscal year from $145.2 million, the level appropriated for this year, to the amount requested by the administration—$159.7 million.

Title III recognizes the national interest in development of the particular institutions it serves. This proposed expansion of title III for endowment building will stimulate that development. I therefore urge my colleagues to vote for the amendment in the nature of a substitute before us today. It represents, in my opinion, an improvement over the bill as reported by committee and is the culmination of a joint effort to launch an endowment-building program that will provide a necessary boost to the many struggling institutions which might otherwise be unable to fulfill their potential—or perhaps even to survive.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ERLENBORN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend his remarks, and particularly the work of the gentleman from Colorado, and the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Challenge Grant Amendments of 1983.

The legislation before us today enjoys broad bipartisan support as a result of the concerted efforts of the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Education of the Senate. This bill has the support of the President and of the higher education community.

The problem which S. 1872 seeks to address is the weak financial condition of some of our Nation's finest postsecondary institutions. The institutions I am referring to are the 194 postsecondary institutions which participate in the title III program authorized under the Higher Education Act. As you know, title III was enacted to strengthen colleges and universities serving large numbers of low-income and minority students to compete with larger, wealthier institutions. Both historically black colleges and universities and community and junior colleges participate in the program. Title III assists these institutions by providing direct aid in the form of grants. These grants may be used for a variety of purposes, including faculty development, improvement of academic programs and the acquisition of instructional equipment.

In recent years, the ability of these institutions to survive has come into question because of competition from larger, State-supported institutions and because of increased operating energy costs. Direct Federal aid in the form of traditional title III grant has not always been sufficient to address this problem. Many title III institutions thus now face the prospect of attempting to offer quality education to students in inadequate facilities using obsolete equipment and dropping certain academic programs or of raising tuition. And because the pool of postsecondary students nationwide has become smaller, these schools risk losing students if they raise tuitions too high.

S. 1872 attempts to address this problem by helping postsecondsary institutions help themselves. Under the legislation contributions to postsecondary institutions participating in programs authorized under title III of the Higher Education Act will be able to receive matching grants for contributions to their endowment funds. In hearings before the Subcommitee on Postsecondary Education earlier this year, the constructive role endowments can play in fostering the growth and stability of postsecondary institutions was investigated. The subcommittee found that some institutions, such as Harvard University, enjoyed very large endowments, sometimes exceeding $1.5 billion. Other institutions, however, had little or no endowment.

Title III institutions traditionally have had difficulty in building strong endowment funds. One explanation for this is the fact that these institutions provide educational opportunity to many students who are poor. Christopher Edley, executive director of the United Negro College Fund, stated, for example:

. . . Endowment income provides 2 percent or less of the revenues at three-quarters of our member colleges in the year 1979-80. UNCF colleges 1979-80 endowments of $3,000 per student were only 50 percent of the national average of $6,000. Almost half of the UNCF colleges have total endowments of under $1 million, and many are in the $25,000 to $100,000 nominal category.

I commend Chairman PAUL SIMON for developing H.R. 2144 to address this problem. I would be remiss, however, if I did not admit to having some reservations about the legislation as it was reported out of the full Committee on Education and Labor. The bill as originally reported left many questions unanswered regarding how this new program would operate. Among these questions was how long Federal oversight over funds awarded to an institution under the program would last?

I am happy to say that these concerns have been addressed in the amendment in the nature of a substitute. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the legislation before us will enjoy the support of the President.

I urge support of this bill.

Mr. KOGOVSEK Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ERLENBORN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, I thank both the ranking member of our committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ERLENBORN) for his work and dedication on this. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin for his support.

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, the bill, S. 1872, is identical to the committee substitute to H.R. 2144, which was printed in the RECORD on September 20, 1983, and made in order under a rule granted by the Committee on Rules on Tuesday. This bill contains agreed upon provisions worked out with the Senate, the Department of Education and Members on both sides of the aisle.

The Senate bill amends title III, part C of the Higher Education Act to authorize Federal matching funds for title III eligible institutions to assist in building or starting an institutional endowment. All Federal funds would be matched on a dollar-for-dollar basis.

Most title III institutions are smaller colleges and universities which have little—under $3 million—or no endowment. Their ability to grow, achieve financial stability and independence is limited. The primary beneficiaries of H.R. 2144 will be the historically black colleges, community colleges, and smaller private colleges and universities. The development of institutional endowments is critical to the survival of many of these schools and to the preservation of diversity among institutions of higher education.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN H.R. 2144 AND S. 1872

Let me clarify for my colleagues in the House the basic differences between H.R. 2144, as reported by the Committee on Education and Labor and the Senate-passed bill.

The bill before the House represents the best provisions contained in H.R. 2144 and a draft bill transmitted to the Senate on July 29, 1983. Its major provisions:

Establish stronger and clearer requirements governing institutional management and investment of endowment funds, as well as financial safeguards to insure appropriate use and accounting of Federal grant funds;

Authorize use of 50 percent of endowment income for several specific purposes or other expenses "necessary to the operation" of the institution, while permitting the Secretary of Education to permit use of the remaining 50 percent if the institution demonstrates, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, that such use is necessary due to: First, a financial emergency—pending insolvency or temporary liquidity; second, a situation which threatens the life of the institution occasioned by a natural disaster or arson; or third, another unusual occurrence;

Adopt a more flexible list of income-producing activities recommended by the administration and adds any obligation of the United States; for example, Treasury bills;

Limit the eligibility of institutions for part C endowment grants to 2 years in any one 5-year authorization minimum grant levels of $50,000 in fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and maximum grant levels of $250,000 in fiscal year 1984 and $500,000 in fiscal year 1985;

Convert the entire part C, challenge grant section to endowment building in fiscal year 1985 in order to make more funds available for eligible postsecondary institutions, in addition to authorizing the secondary to shift out year part B Federal funds to part C. The community college and historically black college setasides would remain in place when the funds are shifted.

The Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education began exploring the status of college endowments in April 1982. More hearings were held in March 1983. During these hearings, the subcommittee learned that most small private postsecondary institutions have very small or no endowments. These institutions face a very uncertain future as tuition costs increase. The presence of a permanent endowment can be the most critical factor in assuring stability and strength in economic hard times.

The use of title III funds for endowment building is probably the single-most important contribution the Federal Government can make. The need is great. As Christopher Edley, president of the United Negro College Fund (UNCF) told the subcommittee:

. . . Endowment income provides 2 percent or less of the revenues at three-quarters of our member colleges in the year 1979–80. UNCF colleges 1979–80 endowments of $3,000 per student were only 50 percent of the national average of $6,000. Almost half of the UNCF colleges have total endowments of under $1 million, and many are in the $25,000 to $100,000 nominal category . . .

Black colleges and universities are not alone. Martha Church, president of Hood College told the subcommittee in 1982:

. . . It is evident to me that Hood is atypical of most colleges and universities of the United States in that it has a modest endowment of approximately $10 million. Among the 3,000 or so colleges and universities in the United States, there are perhaps 100 to 125 that have substantial endowments, and I would say that would be something over $25 million. Even these funds are being seriously eroded by inflation. I wish Hood were among those institutions suffering that problem. We are not. We have approximately, by market value, a little over $10 million; $2.5 million of those funds are in a special restricted account where both the investment and the use of the moneys are prescribed by the nature of the gift we have received, so it leaves us a small portion to look at and to invest as wisely as possible.

Last year, the Department of Education returned $1.3 million to the Treasury in unspent challenge grant funds. If this bill had been law, the endowment building program would be well underway.

COMMITTEE EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

The bill creates a new section 333 of title III, part C of the Higher Education Act of 1965. The purpose of the new endowment provisions is to provide Federal matching funds to assist title III eligible institutions to establish or increase institutional endowments. The terms "endowment fund," "endowment fund corpus," and "endowment fund income" are defined.

The Secretary is authorized to make grants to eligible institutions under section 331(a)(1). A Federal grant must be matched on a dollar-for-dollar basis from nonfederal sources and the institutional matching funds must not be removed from an existing endowment fund. Institutional matching funds should be new moneys, made available to the institution for the first time for this purpose. The grant period is for 20-years, during which the endowment principal may not be withdrawn or expended. After expiration of the 20-year grant period, the principal and interest may be used for any educational purpose.

Eligible grantees may receive a grant for any 2 years during a 5-year authorization period. The minimum grant award shall be $50,000 and the maximum grant award will be $250,000 in fiscal year 1984 and $500,000 in fiscal year 1985.

The Secretary is authorized to require successful grantees to designate a foundation to receive an endowment grant. The Secretary may not award a grant unless the institution assures the Secretary that it is legally authorized to receive and administer a grant and the institution assures the Secretary that it will administer the funds in accordance with the law and implementing regulations.

The bill permits grant funds to be invested in income-producing activities that a regulated insurance company may invest in under State law, such as certificates of deposit, money market funds, stocks and bonds, and obligations of the United States including Treasury bills. This would allow institutions to invest and to realize a greater rate of return and increase the value of their endowment. Further, the institution would be required to exercise prudent, discreet, and intelligent judgment in investing the established endowment fund.

The bill permits an institution to expend up to 50 percent of the interest income for expenses necessary to the operation of the college, including expenses of operation and maintenance administration academic and support personnel, construction and renovation, community and student services programs, and technical assistance. The remaining 50 percent of interest income may only be spent with the Secretary's approval, if the grantee institution demonstrates to the Secretary's satisfaction that: First, a financial emergency exists, such as a pending insolvency or inability of the institution to pay its bills or meet its payroll for more than 60 days; second, a situation which threatens the life of the institution due to real property or equipment destruction caused by a natural disaster, arson, and so forth, or third, some other unusual occurrence, such as a large personal injury or other judgment against the institution or its officers or employees—for which the institution would be liable.

The bill establishes penalties for withdrawing any of the endowment principal, whether Federal or institutional match, and for expending interest income improperly. Such penalties will insure that institutions adhere to grant terms, and give the Secretary an option other than termination of the grant for dealing with violations.

The bill provides for the Secretary to audit endowment funds accounts and access to such information as may be necessary for the Secretary to audit or examine all endowment fund expenditures.

In making awards among the universe of eligible applicants, the Secretary is to give priority to any applicant who is a current grantee under part A or B or title III and those applicants who demonstrate the greatest need. The Secretary shall also consider the effort the applicant has made to build or maintain an existing endowment and the degree to which the applicant institution intends to match with nongovernmental funds. These matching funds should be new funds—made available from private sources or specifically appropriated by the State legislature for this purpose for the first time. The endowment concept is intended to create a new partnership between the Federal Government and title III eligible institutions which will result in a greater degree of financial stability for this group of institutions.

The bill authorizes the Secretary to promulgate regulations governing the application process. A point system, specifically tied to the statutory criteria, should be used in evaluating individual proposals from eligible institutions.

A grant termination hearing is provided for if the grantee institution violates the statutory provisions governing expenditure of endowment principal or interest, or the standards regarding the degree of care owed the Government in making prudent investments. The Secretary must make new endowment awards from funds returned to the Secretary if a grant is terminated and funds repaid. Either new awards or supplemental awards to extant grantee institutions are authorized. If the Secretary terminates a grant, after a hearing, the grantee must repay, the sum of the original grant or grants, and the interest earned.

Twenty percent of the part C appropriation in fiscal year 1984 is reserved for endowment building, however, in fiscal year 1985 the entire part C appropriation shall be used for that purpose. In addition, the bill authorizes the shifting of an amount equal to the percentage of the out-year institutional matching funds under part B to part C for endowment building purposes. For example, in the third year of funding, when part B funds would require an institutional match of 10 percent under current law, 10 percent of third year funds, which would otherwise be available for new part B grants, could be transferred to the part C endowment-building activity prior to that year's part B competition.

The bill raises the authorization for title III from $129.6 to $134,416 for fiscal year 1984.

The bill also increases the authorization for Howard University for fiscal year 1984, establishes a "such sums" authorization for title VII, parts A and B of the Higher Education Act, and corrects a technical error affecting a title VII appropriation in Public Law 98–63.

Finally, I want to acknowledge the cooperation and support of my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ERLENBORN and my friend from Missouri Mr. COLEMAN the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee. In addition we have worked closely with Senator STAFFORD who chairs the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities and who shepherded the bill through the other body.

I also want to pay tribute to Dr. Frederick C. Patterson, President Emeritus of Tuskegee Institute and founder of the United Negro College Fund. Dr. Patterson's wisdom led to the creation of the College Endowment Funding Plan which benefits 20 of the 42 UNCF member colleges, and his persistence has contributed to the passage of this legislation.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 1872, the Challenge Grant Amendments of 1983. The purpose of this bill is to amend parts C and D of title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended, to authorize a program of matching endowment grants to eligible institutions. These grants would allow many of our Nation's historically black colleges to move one step further toward independence and self-sufficiency by assisting in the development and enhancement of endowment funds. The bill also makes certain needed changes to the Omnibus Education Reconciliation Act of 1981.

I wish to commend my colleague, PAUL SIMON, who is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education. He has exhibited significant leadership on this issue. I would also like to commend Senator ROBERT STAFFORD, chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities for his leadership in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, this Nation's historically black colleges produced many of our most prominent black leaders including a Supreme Court Justice and several Members of the House. These institutions deserve our continued support.●

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1872

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Challenge Grant Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. Part C of title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "the Act") is amended by adding after section 332 the following new section:

"ENDOWMENT GRANTS

"SEC. 333. (a)(1) The purpose of this section is to establish a program to provide matching grants to eligible institutions of higher education in order to establish or increase endowment funds at such institutions, to provide additional incentives to promote fundraising activities by such institutions, and to foster increased independence and self-sufficiency at such institutions.

"(2) For purposes of this section:

"(A) The term 'endowment fund' means a fund established by State law, by an institution of higher education, or by a foundation which is exempt from taxation and is maintained for the purpose of generating income for the support of the institution, but which shall not include real estate.

"(B) The term 'endowment fund corpus' means an amount equal to the grant or grants awarded under this section plus an amount equal to such grant or grants provided by the institution.

"(C) The term 'endowment fund income' means an amount equal to the total value of the endowment fund established under this section minus the endowment fund corpus.

"(b)(1) From sums available for this section under section 347, the Secretary is authorized to award endowment grants to eligible institutions of higher education to establish or increase an endowment fund at such institution. Such grants shall be made only to eligible institutions described in paragraph (4) whose applications have been approved pursuant to subsection (g).

"(2) No institution shall receive a grant under this section, unless such institution has deposited in its endowment fund established under this section an amount equal to the amount of such grant. The source of funds for this institutional match shall not include Federal funds or funds from an existing endowment fund.

"(3)(A) The period of a grant under this section shall be not more than twenty years.

"(B) During the grant period, an institution may not withdraw or expend any of the endowment fund corpus.

"(C) After the termination of the grant period, an institution may use the endowment fund corpus plus any endowment fund income for any educational purpose.

"(4)(A) An institution of higher education is eligible to receive a grant under this section if it is an eligible institution as described in section 331(a)(1).

"(B) No institution shall be ineligible for an endowment grant for a fiscal year by reason of the previous receipt of such a grant, but no institution shall be eligible to receive such a grant for more than two fiscal years out of any period of five consecutive fiscal years.

"(5) An endowment grant under this section to an eligible institution year shall—

"(A) not be less than $50,000 for any fiscal year; and

"(B) not be more than (i) $250,000 for fiscal year 1984; or (ii) $500,000 for fiscal year 1985 or any succeeding fiscal year.

"(6)(A) An eligible institution may designate a foundation, which was established for the purpose of raising money for the institution, as the recipient of the grant awarded under this section.

"(B) The Secretary shall not award a grant to a foundation on behalf of an institution unless—

"(i) the institution assures the Secretary that the foundation is legally authorized to receive the endowment fund corpus and is legally authorized to administer the fund in accordance with this section and any implementing regulations;

"(ii) the foundation agrees to administer the fund in accordance with the requirements of this section and any implementing regulation; and

"(iii) the institution agrees to be liable for any violation by the foundation of the provisions of this section and any implementing regulations, including any monetary liability that may arise as a result of such violation.

"(c)(1) An institution awarded a grant under this section shall enter into an agreement with the Secretary containing satisfactory assurances that it will (A) immediately comply with the matching requirements of subsection (b)(2), (B) establish an endowment fund independent of any other such fund of the institution, (C) invest the endowment fund corpus, and (D) meet the other requirements of this section.

"(2)(A) An institution shall invest the endowment fund corpus and endowment fund income in low-risk securities in which a regulated insurance company may invest under the law of the State in which the institution is located such as a federally insured bank savings account or comparable interest bearing account, certificate of deposit, money market fund, mutual fund, or obligations of the United States.

"(B) The institution, in investing the endowment fund established under this section, shall exercise the judgment and care, under the circumstances then prevailing, which a person of prudence, discretion, and intelligence would exercise in the management of his own affairs.

"(3)(A) An institution may withdraw and expend the endowment fund income to defray any expenses necessary to the operation of such college, including expenses of operations and maintenance, administration, academic and support personnel, construction and renovation, community and student services programs, and technical assistance.

"(B)(i) Except as provided in clause (ii), an institution may not spend more than 50 per centum of the total aggregate endowment fund income earned prior to the time of expenditure.

"(ii) The Secretary may permit an institution to spend more than 50 per centum of the endowment fund income notwithstanding clause (i) if the institution demonstrates such an expenditure is necessary because of (I) a financial emergency, such as a pending insolvency or temporary liquidity problem; (II) a life-threatening situation occasioned by a natural disaster or arson; or (III) another unusual occurence or exigent circumstance.

"(d)(1) If at any time an institution withdraws part of the endowment fund corpus, it shall repay to the Secretary an amount equal to 50 per centum of the withdrawn amount, which represents the Federal share, plus income earned thereon. The Secretary may use such repaid funds to make additional endowment grants, or to increase existing endowment grants, to other eligible institutions.

"(2) If an institution expends more of the endowment fund income than is permitted under subsection (c), the grantee shall repay the Secretary an amount equal to 50 per centum of the amount improperly expended (representing the Federal share thereof). The Secretary may use such repaid fund to make additional endowment grants, or to increase existing endowment grants, to other eligible institutions.

"(e) An institution receiving a grant under this section shall provide to the Secretary (or his designee) such information (or access thereto) as may be necessary to audit or examine expenditures made from the endowment fund corpus or income in order to determine compliance with this section.

"(f) In selecting eligible institutions for grants under this section for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall—

"(1) give priority to an applicant which is a recipient of a grant made under part A or B of this title during the academic year in which the applicant is applying for a grant under this section; and

"(2) give priority to an applicant with a greater need for such a grant, based on the current market value of the applicant's existing endowment in relation to the number of full-time equivalent students enrolled at such institution;

"(3) consider—

"(A) the effort made by the applicant to build or maintain its existing endowment fund; and

"(B) the degree to which an applicant proposes to match the grant with nongovernmental funds.

"(g) Any institution which is eligible for assistance under this section may submit to the Secretary a grant application at such time, in such form, and containing such information as the Secretary may prescribe. Subject to the availability of appropriations to carry out this section and consistent with the requirement of subsection (f), the Secretary may approve an application for a grant if an institution, in its application, provides adequate assurances that it will comply with the requirements of this section.

"(h)(1) After notice and an opportunity for a hearing, the Secretary may terminate and recover a grant awarded under this section if the grantee institution—

"(A) expends portions of the endowment fund corpus or expends more than the permissible amount of the endowment funds income as prescribed in subsection (c)(3);

"(B) fails to invest the endowment fund in accordance with the investment standards set forth in subsection (c)(2); or

"(C) fails to properly account to the Secretary concerning the investment and expenditures of the endowment funds.

"(2) If the Secretary terminates a grant under paragraph (1), the grantee shall return to the Secretary an amount equal to the sum of the original grant or grants under this section plus income earned thereon. The Secretary may use such repaid funds to make additional endowment grants, or to increase existing endowment grants, to other eligible institutions.".

SEC. 3. Section 347 of the Act is amended—

(1) by inserting after the period at the end of subsection (a)(2) the following: "Of the amount appropriated for such part for fiscal year 1984, 20 per centum shall be available for grants under section 333 of such part, and of the amount appropriated for such part for fiscal year 1985, 100 per centum shall be available for grants under such section"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) For each fiscal year, the Secretary may reserve from the appropriation for part B not more than an amount equal to the aggregate amount grantees receiving grants under part B would contribute under section 324 to the cost of the grants in that fiscal year, assuming the grant amounts remain the same as those received in the prior fiscal year, and may be use those funds to award grants to eligible institutions under section 333. In reserving and awarding such funds, the Secretary shall assure that funds that would have been reserved under part B for the institutions described in subsection (c) or (e) shall continue to be set aside under section 333 for those institutions.".

SEC. 4. (a) Section 516(c) of the Omnibus Education Reconciliation Act of 1981 is amended by striking out paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) The total amount of appropriations to carry out title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 shall not exceed $134,416,000 for fiscal year 1984.".

(b) Section 503 of such Act is amended by striking out "1982, 1983, and 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1982 and 1983 and $159,700,000 for fiscal year 1984".

(c) Notwithstanding section 516(g) of such Act, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out parts A and B of title VII of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

(d) Subsections (a)(2), (b), and (c) of section 721 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 shall not apply to funds appropriated by Public Law 98-63 for part B of title VII of the Higher Education Act of 1965. Such funds shall be used in accordance with section 713(g) of such Act and distributed in accordance with the statement of the managers pertaining to the appropriation of such funds, as contained in the conference report on Public Law 98-63 (H. Rep. 98-308, p. 53).

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 2144) was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

FUR SEAL ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1983

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2840) to provide for the orderly termination of Federal management of the Pribilof Islands, Alaska, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

H.R. 2840

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That this Act may be cited as the "Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. The Act of November 2, 1966 (Public Law 89-702; 16 U.S.C. 1151-1187), known as the Fur Seal Act of 1966, is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE I—FUR SEAL MANAGEMENT

"SEC. 101. (a) 'Commission' means the North Pacific Fur Seal Commission established pursuant to article V of the Convention.

"(b) 'Convention' means the Interim Convention on the Conservation of North Pacific Fur Seals signed at Washington on February 9, 1957, as amended by the protocol signed in Washington on October 8, 1963; by the exchange of notes among the party governments which became effective on September 3, 1969; by the protocol signed in Washington on May 7, 1976; and by the protocol signed in Washington on October 14, 1980, by the parties.

"(c) 'Fur Seal' means the North Pacific Fur Seal, Callorhinus Ursinus.

"(d) 'Import' means to land on, bring into, or introduce into, or attempt to land on, bring into, or introduce into, any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whether or not such landing, bringing, or introduction constitutes an importation within the meaning of the customs laws of the United States.

"(e) 'Natives of the Pribilof Islands' means any Aleuts who are permanent residents of the Pribilof Islands, or any organization or entity representing such natives.

"(f) 'North Pacific Ocean' means the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirtieth parallel of north latitude, including the Bering, Okhotsk, and Japan Seas.

"(g) 'Party' or 'parties' means the United States of America, Canada, Japan, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

"(h) 'Person' means any individual, partnership, corporation, trust, association, or any other private entity, or any officer, employee, agent, department, or instrumentality of the Federal Government, of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government.

"(i) 'Pribilof Islands' means the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, Walrus and Otter Islands, and Sea Lion Rock.

"(j) 'Sealing' means the taking of fur seals.

"(k) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Commerce.

"(l) 'Take' or 'taking' means to harass, hunt, capture, or kill, or attempt to harass, hunt, capture, or kill.

"SEC. 102. It is unlawful, except as provided in this Act or by regulation of the Secretary, for any person or vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to engage in the taking of fur seals in the North Pacific Ocean or on lands or waters under the jurisdiction of the United States, or to use any port or harbor or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States for any purpose connected in any way with such taking, or for any person to transport, import, offer for sale, or possess at any port or place or on any vessel, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, fur seals or the parts thereof, including, but not limited to, raw, dressed, or dyed fur seal skins, taken contrary to the provisions of this Act or the Convention, or for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to refuse to permit, except within the Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States, a duly authorized official of Canada, Japan, or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to board and search any vessel which is outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and which is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to determine whether such vessel is engaged in sealing contrary to the provisions of said Convention.

"SEC. 103. (a) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who dwell on the coasts of the North Pacific Ocean are permitted to take fur seals and dispose of their skins after the skins have been officially marked and certified by a person authorized by the Secretary: Provided, That the seals are taken for subsistence uses as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1379), and only in canoes not transported by or used in connection with other vessels, and propelled entirely by oars, paddles, or sails, and manned by not more than five persons each, in the way hitherto practiced and without the use of firearms. This authority shall not apply to Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos while they are employed by any person for the purpose of taking fur seals or are under contract to deliver the skins to any person.

"(b) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who live on the Pribilof Islands are authorized to take fur seals for subsistence purposes as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1379), under such conditions as recommended by the Commission and accepted by the Secretary of State pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

"SEC. 104. The Secretary shall (1) conduct such scientific research and investigations on the fur seal resources of the North Pacific Ocean as he deems necessary to carry out the obligations of the United States under the Convention, and (2) permit, subject to such terms and conditions as he deems desirable, the taking, transportation, importation, exportation, or possession of fur seals or their parts for educational, scientific, or exhibition purposes.

"SEC. 105. (a) The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations with respect to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands and on lands subject to the jurisdiction of the United States as he deems necessary and appropriate for the conservation, management, and protection of the fur seal population, and to dispose of any fur seals seized or forfeited pursuant to this Act, and to carry out the provisions of the Convention, and shall deliver to authorized agents of the parties such fur seal skins as the parties are entitled to under the Convention.

"(b) The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements with any public or private agency or person for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Convention and of this title, including but not limited to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom.

"(c) The Secretary shall give preference to the village corporations of Saint Paul and Saint George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203) for the taking of fur seals on the village corporations' respective islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom. Any proceeds therefrom will be deposited in a separate fund in the Treasury and will be available to the Secretary, subject to appropriations, for the purposes of this section. All seal harvests will be financed, to the extent possible, from proceeds collected in preceding years or unsold assets retained from harvests conducted in preceding years. In the event that such assets and proceeds are insufficient, as determined by the Secretary, to finance the seal harvest in accordance with the requirements of the Convention, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary for fiscal year 1985 and beyond such sums as may be necessary to carry out the harvest and curing pursuant to this section. Such amounts as are determined by the Secretary to exceed amounts required to carry out this section shall be transferred to the General Fund of the Treasury.

"(d)(1) In order to carry out the purposes of the Convention and subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the Secretary, under terms and conditions prescribed by him, may agree to purchase, to make restitution for losses, or to otherwise permit the recoupment of the costs incurred in the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, and the curing of the sealskins and other seal parts, for the annual harvests conducted pursuant to the Convention in calendar years 1982, 1983, and 1984.

"(2) Payments authorized to be made by the Secretary under this subsection shall be appropriated for fiscal year 1984 in sums not to exceed $1,000,000.

"SEC. 106. (a) Any person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act who has reasonable cause to believe that any vessel outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and subject to the jurisdiction of any of the parties to the Convention is violating the provisions of article III of the Convention may, except within the areas in which another State exercises fisheries jurisdiction, board and search such vessel. Such person shall carry a special certificate of identification issued by the Secretary or Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating which shall be in English, Japanese, and Russian, and which shall be exhibited to the master of the vessel upon request.

"(b) If, after boarding and searching such vessel, such person continues to have reasonable cause to believe that such vessel, or any person on board, is violating said article, he may seize such vessel or arrest such person, or both. The Secretary of State shall, as soon as practicable, notify the party having jurisdiction over the vessel or person of such seizure or arrest. The Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, upon request of the Secretary of State, shall deliver the seized vessel or arrested person, or both, as promptly as practicable to the authorized officials of said party: Provided, That, whenever said party cannot immediately accept such delivery, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating may, upon the request of the Secretary of State, keep the vessel or person in custody within the United States.

"(c) At the request of said party, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating shall direct the person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act to attend the trial as a witness in any case arising under said article or give testimony by deposition, and shall produce such records and files or copies thereof as may be necessary to establish the offense.

"SEC. 107. The President shall appoint to the Commission a United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may appoint one native from each of the two inhabited Pribilof Islands to serve as advisers to the Commissioner and as liaisons between the Commissioner and the natives of the Pribilof Islands. The President may also appoint other interested parties as advisers to the Commissioner. Such advisers shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may also appoint a Deputy United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The Deputy Commissioner shall be the principal adviser of the Commissioner, and shall perform the duties of the Commissioner in the case of his death, resignation, absence, or illness. The Commissioner, the Deputy Commissioner, and the advisers shall receive no compensation for their services. The Commissioners may be paid travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at the rates authorized by section 5 of the Administrative Expense Act of 1946 when engaged in the performance of their duties.

"SEC. 108. The Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Secretary, is authorized to accept or reject, on behalf of the United States, recommendations made by the Commission pursuant to article V of the Convention.

"SEC. 109. The head of any Federal agency is authorized to consult with and provide technical assistance to the Secretary or the Commission whenever such assistance is needed and reasonably can be furnished in carrying out the provisions of this title. Any Federal agency furnishing assistance hereunder may expend its own funds for such purposes, with or without reimbursement.

"TITLE II—ADMINISTRATION OF THE PRIBILOF ISLANDS

"SEC. 201. The Secretary shall administer the fur seal rookeries and other Federal real and personal property on the Pribilof Islands, with the exception of lands purchased by the United States Fish and Wildlife Service under section 1417 of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487) and, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, shall ensure that activities on such Islands are consistent with the purposes of conserving, managing, and protecting the North Pacific fur seals and other wildlife, and for other purposes consistent with that primary purpose.

"SEC. 202. In carrying out the provisions of this title, the Secretary is authorized—

"(1) to operate, maintain, and repair such Government-owned property, both real and personal, and other facilities held by the Secretary on the Pribilof Islands as may be necessary; and

"(2) to provide the employees of the Department of Commerce and other Federal agencies and their dependents, at reasonable rates to be determined by the Secretary, with such facilities, services, and equipment as he deems necessary, including, but not limited to, food, fuel, shelter, and transportation.

"SEC. 203. The State of Alaska will be responsible for meeting the educational needs of the citizens of the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 204. The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall provide medical and dental care to the natives of the Pribilof Islands with or without reimbursement, as provided by other law. He is authorized to provide such care to Federal employees and their dependents and tourists and other persons in the Pribilof Islands at reasonable rates to be determined by him. He may purchase, lease, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities, supplies, and equipment as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this section; and the costs of such items, including medical and dental care, shall be charged to the budget of the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as superseding or limiting the authority and responsibility of the Secretary of Health and Human Services under the Act of August 5, 1954, as amended, or any other law with respect to medical and dental care of natives or other persons in the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 205. (a) Any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary notwithstanding, the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, is authorized to bargain, grant, sell, or otherwise convey, on such terms as he deems to be in the best interests of the United States and in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, any and all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the property, both real and personal, held by the Secretary on the Pribilof Islands: Provided, That such property is specified in a document entitled 'Transfer of Property on the Pribilof Islands: Descriptions, Terms and Conditions', which is submitted to the Congress on or before September 30, 1983.

"(b) The property transfer document described in subsection (a) shall include, but need not be limited to—

"(1) a description of each conveyance;

"(2) the terms to be imposed on each conveyance;

"(3) designation of the recipient of each conveyance;

"(4) a statement noting acceptance of each conveyance, including the terms, if any, under which it is accepted; and

"(5) an identification of all Federal property to be retained by the Federal Government on the Pribilof Islands to meet its responsibilities as described in this Act and under the Convention.

"(c) Within 60 days of the transfer of real or personal property specified in the document described in subsection (a), the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate shall be given a report prepared by the Secretary stating the fair market value at the time of the transfer of all real and personal property conveyed.

"(d) A Memorandum of Understanding shall be entered into by the Secretary, a representative of the local governmental authority on each Island, the trustee or trustees, and the appropriate officer of the State of Alaska, setting forth the respective responsibilities of the Federal Government, the Trust, and the State regarding—

"(1) application of Federal retirement benefits, severance pay, and insurance benefits with respect to natives of the Pribilof Islands;

"(2) funding to be allocated by the State of Alaska for the construction of boat harbors on Saint Paul and Saint George Islands;

"(3) assumption by the State of Alaska of traditional State responsibilities for facilities and services on such islands in accordance with applicable laws and regulations;

"(4) preservation of wildlife resources;

"(5) continued activities relating to the implementation of the Convention;

"(6) oversight of the operation of the Trust established by section 206(a) to further progress toward creation of a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent on commercial fur sealing;

"(7) the cooperation of Government agencies, rendered through existing programs, in assisting with an orderly transition from Federal management and the creation of a private enterprise economy on the Pribilof Islands as described in this Act; and

"(8) such other matters as may be necessary and appropriate for carrying out the purposes of the Act, including the assumption of responsibilities to ensure an orderly transition from Federal management of the Pribilof Islands.

The Memorandum shall be submitted to Congress on or before September 30, 1983.

"(e) The grant, sale, transfer, or conveyance of any real or personal property pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State, or local taxation. The basis for computing gain or loss on subsequent sale or disposition of such real or personal property for purposes of any Federal, State, or local tax imposed on or measured by revenue shall be the fair market value of such real or personal property at the time of receipt.

"(f) In carrying out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements, including but not limited to, land exchange agreements with other departments and agencies of both the State and Federal governments, and with third parties, notwithstanding any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary; except that exchanges involving lands in the National Wildlife Refuge System on the date of enactment of the Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983 are not authorized by this section.

"(g) The Secretary shall submit to Congress a report, no later than September 1, 1983, providing information on the status of the negotiations for concluding the documents described in subsections (a) and (d) of this section.

"SEC. 206. (a)(1) In order to promote the development of a stable, self-sufficient, enduring, and diversified economy not dependent on sealing, the Secretary shall cause to be established a Trust for the benefit of the natives of the Pribilof Islands, to be known as the 'Pribilof Islands Trust' (hereinafter referred to as the 'Trust').

"(2) All amounts appropriated to the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section shall be transferred by the Secretary to the Trust within 15 days after submission of the Trust instrument to Congress in accordance with the requirements of subsection (c).

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (e)(2), none of the amounts transferred to the Trust pursuant to paragraph (2) shall be distributed by the trustee or trustees for the benefit of the natives of the Pribilof Islands until 30 days after submission to Congress of the documents described in sections 205 (a) and (d). Such distributions shall be made by the trustee or trustees only after the Secretary has determined that such trust has been established and will be operated in accordance with a Trust instrument, or instruments, approved by the Secretary which further the purposes and policies of this Act.

"(4) Until the termination of the period described in paragraph (3), the trustee or trustees shall invest the amounts transferred pursuant to paragraph (2) in securities with maturities suitable for the needs of the Trust, bearing interest rates at rates determined by the trustee or trustees, taking into consideration average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The income from such investments shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust.

"(b) The Trust shall be administered in accordance with such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Secretary and as set forth in the Trust instrument. In establishing such terms and conditions, the Secretary shall consult with the natives of the Pribilof Islands and other interested parties concerning the conservation, management, and protection of the fur seal population.

"(c) There may be one Trust instrument establishing the Trust described in section 206(a), or two such instruments, each relating to one of the two portions of the Trust as provided in subsection (d), which shall address, but need not be limited to, such matters as—

"(1) establishing standards and procedures for the disbursement by the trustee or trustees of trust assets for purposes of fostering in the Pribilof Islands a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent upon sealing after Federal management of the islands is terminated, which procedures may include formal participation of Pribilof Island Native councils, corporations, or other such entities;

"(2) establishing the Secretary as trustor;

"(3) establishing the procedure for appointment of the trustee or trustees by the Secretary after consultation with the natives of the Pribilof Islands;

"(4) setting forth the rights, duties, powers, and obligations of a trustee who shall act as an independent fiduciary and who shall be a United States citizen having recognized competence in business;

"(5) providing for the management and investment of Trust assets, pending distribution, by an investment manager or adviser, who may be the trustee, having recognized competence in such fields;

"(6) establishing methods and procedures for providing Congress and the Secretary with the annual reports described in subsection (g) of this section;

"(7) establishing Trust purposes in accordance with the purposes described in section 201 of this Act and subsection (a) of this section;

"(8) the duties of the trustee or trustees and the standards of care and diligence that shall govern the exercise of trust powers thereunder;

"(9) compensation of the trustee or trustees;

"(10) the term, termination, and final distribution of the Trust estate;

"(11) mandating the applicability of the laws of the State of Alaska to the creation and governance of the Trust;

"(12) defraying of community expenses; and

"(13) payment of necessary administrative and legal expenses.

The Trust instrument or instruments described in this subsection shall be submitted to Congress on or before September 30, 1983.

"(d) The Trust shall be divided into two portions pursuant to a formula established by the Secretary after consultation with the natives of both islands, to be accounted for separately for the independent benefit of the community of Saint Paul and the community of Saint George.

"(e)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $20,000,000 for the purpose of funding the Trust in accordance with the requirements of subsection (a)(2) of this section.

"(2) Prior to the submission to Congress of the documents described in sections 205 (a) and (d), the trustee or trustees may make interim distributions for the benefit of the natives of the Pribilof Islands, upon approval of the Secretary, of up to 5 percent of the amounts transferred to the Trust pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section if, as determined by the Secretary, such interim distributions are required to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(f) The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any asset or obligation held in the Trust shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust.

"(g) The trustee or trustees shall submit to Congress and to the Secretary an annual report, the first of which is due on March 31, 1984, and subsequent reports on the same date each year thereafter during the life of the Trust, providing information on expenditures made from the Trust and progress toward achieving the purposes set out in subsection (a) of this section. On March 31, 1986, the Secretary shall also submit a report to the Congress detailing all progress toward achieving these purposes since enactment of this Act. For purposes of preparing such report, the Secretary by regulation may require that the trustee and the State of Alaska submit such relevant information to the Secretary as he deems appropriate.

"(h) The funds appropriated to the Trust and the earnings and distribution therefrom shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State, or local taxation: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply to any income from the investment or other use of such distributions.

"SEC. 207. The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements, contracts, or leases with, or to issue permits to, any public or private agency or any person for carrying out the provisions of the Convention or this Act.

"SEC. 208. (a) Service by natives of the Pribilof Islands engaged in the taking and curing of fur sealskins and other activities in connection with the administration of such islands prior to January 1, 1950, as determined by the Secretary based on records available to him, shall be considered for purposes of credit under the Civil Service Retirement Act, as amended, as civilian service performed by an employee, as defined in said Act.

"(b) The annuity of any person or the annuity of the survivor of any person who shall have performed service described in subsection (a) of this section, and who, prior to November 2, 1966, died or shall have been retired on annuity payable from the civil service retirement and disability fund, shall, upon application filed by the annuitant within 1 year after November 2, 1966, be adjusted, effective as of the first day of the month immediately following November 2, 1966, so that the amount of the annuity shall be the same as if such subsection had been in effect at the time of such person's retirement or death.

"(c) In no case shall credit for the service described in subsection (a) of this section entitle a person to the benefits of section 11(h) of the Civil Service Retirement Act.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act or any other law, benefits under the Civil Service Retirement Act made available by reason of the provisions of this section shall be paid from the civil service retirement and disability fund subject to reimbursement to such fund from the Operations, Research, and Facilities Account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, for the purpose of compensating said retirement fund for the cost, as determined by the Civil Service Commission during each fiscal year, of benefits provided by this section.

"SEC. 209. Chapter 83 of title 5, United States Code, is amended as follows:

"(a) by deleting 'Credit' in section 8332(b) and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'Except as provided in paragraph (13) of this subsection, credit';

"(b) by adding in section 8332(b) after paragraph (12) the following new paragraph:

" '(13) 1 year of service to be credited for each year in which a native of the Pribilof Islands performs service in the taking and curing of fur sealskins and other activities in connection with the administration of the Pribilof Islands, notwithstanding any period of separation from the service.';

"(c) by adding in section 8332(b) after 'paragraph (3) of this subsection.' the following sentence: 'The Office of Personnel Management shall accept the certification of the Secretary of Commerce or his designee concerning service for the purpose of this subchapter of the type performed by an employee named by paragraph (13) of this subsection.';

"(d) by adding in section 8332(f) after 'postal field service' the words 'and service described in paragraph (13) of subsection (b) of this section.';

"(e) by adding in section 8332(l)(1) the word 'or' at the end of clause (v) of subparagraph (B) thereof and by adding the following new subparagraph:

" '(C) Is of Aleut ancestry and while a citizen of the United States was interned or otherwise detained, or relocated to any camp, installation, or other facility, in the territory of Alaska which was established during World War II for the purpose of the internment, detention, or relocation of Aleuts pursuant to any statute, rule, regulation, or order;"; and

"(f) by amending paragraph (4) of section 8334(g) by striking 'January 1, 1950' and substituting the words 'October 1, 1983,' and adding after 'the Pribilof Islands' the words 'except where deductions, contributions, and deposits were made before October 1, 1983'.

"SEC. 210. (a) Title I of the Act of January 4, 1975, Public Law 93-638 (25 U.S.C. 450-450m), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, is amended by adding in section 105(e) after 'to be employed by a tribal organization', the words ', the city of Saint Paul, Alaska, the city of Saint George, Alaska, upon incorporation, or the village corporations of Saint Paul and Saint George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203)'.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any native of the Pribilof Islands employed by the Federal Government on September 30, 1983, shall be deemed to have been covered under chapters 81, 83, 85, and 87 of title 5, United States Code, on such date for the purposes of determining eligibility for continuity of benefits under section 105(e) of the Act of January 4, 1975 (Public Law 93-638), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.

"SEC. 211. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

"TITLE III—ENFORCEMENT

"SEC. 301. (a) Every vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States that is employed in any manner in connection with a violation of the provision of this Act, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores, shall be subject to forfeiture; and all fur seals, or parts thereof, taken or retained in violation of this Act, or the monetary value thereof, shall be forfeited.

"(b) All provisions of law relating to the seizure, summary and judicial forfeiture, and condemnation of a vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores for violation of the customs laws, the disposition of such vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores, or the proceeds from the sale thereof, and the remission or mitigation of such forfeitures shall apply to seizures and forfeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this Act, insofar as such provisions of law are applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

"SEC. 302. (a) Enforcement of the provisions of this Act is the joint responsibility of the Secretary, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating. In addition, the Secretary may designate officers and employees of the States of the United States to enforce the provisions of this Act which relate to persons or vessels subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. When so designated, such officers and employees are authorized to function as Federal law enforcement agents for these purposes; but they shall not be held and considered as employees of the United States for the purpose of any laws administered by the Office of Personnel Management.

"(b) The judges of the United States district courts and United States magistrates may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue such warrants or other process, including warrants or other process issued in admiralty proceedings in Federal district courts, as may be required for enforcement of this Act and any regulations issued thereunder.

"(c) Any person authorized to carry out enforcement activities hereunder shall have the power to execute any warrant or process issued by any officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of this Act.

"(d) Such person so authorized shall have the power—

"(1) with or without a warrant or other process, to arrest any person committing in his presence or view a violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder; and

"(2) with a warrant or other process or without a warrant, if he has reasonable cause to believe that a vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or any person onboard is in violation of any provision of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder, to search such vessel and to arrest such person.

"(e) Such person so authorized may seize any vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, together with its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores, used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder or which it reasonably appears has been used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder.

"(f) Such person so authorized may seize, whenever and wherever lawfully found, all fur seals taken or retained in violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder. Any fur seals so seized or forfeited to the United States pursuant to this Act shall be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of section 105 of this Act.

"SEC. 303. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 304. (a) Any person who knowingly violates any provision of this Act or of any permit or regulation issued thereunder shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $20,000 for such violation, or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both.

"(b) Any person who violates any provision of this Act or any regulation or permit issued hereunder may be assessed a civil penalty by the Secretary of not more than $10,000 for each such violation. No penalty shall be assessed unless such person is given notice and opportunity for a hearing with respect to such violation. Hearings held during proceedings for the assessment of civil penalties authorized by this subsection shall be conducted in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code. The Secretary may issue subpenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of relevant papers, books, and documents, and administer oaths. Witnesses summoned shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena served upon any person pursuant to this paragraph, the district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found or resides or transacts business, upon application by the United States and after notice to such person, shall have jurisdiction to issue an order requiring such person to appear and give testimony before the Secretary or to appear and produce documents before the Secretary, or both, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. Any civil penalty assessed may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary for good cause shown. Upon any failure to pay a penalty assessed under this subsection, the Secretary may request the Attorney General to institute civil action in a district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found, resides, or transacts business to collect the penalty, and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide any such action.

"SEC. 305. There are authorized to be appropriated to the operations, research, and facilities account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, such sums as may be necessary, up to $2,000,000, for fiscal year 1984 for the purpose of upgrading Federal property to be transferred pursuant to section 205 of this Act, $736,000 for fiscal year 1984 for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act, and such sums as may be necessary for each fiscal year thereafter for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act.".

Mr. BREAUX (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, this bill is an important bill. I would like to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), perhaps to explain a little further just what we are doing here this morning.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before the House, H.R. 2840, originally passed the House on May 23, 1983. The Senate passed the bill on August 4 after adopting an amendment in the nature of a substitute. While we are again offering a complete substitute to the Senate-passed bill, the substantive differences are relatively minor and I will explain them shortly.

First, however, I would like to point out that this bill is designed to resolve a century-old problem in the Pribilof Islands, a problem which has only been exacerbated by recent Federal spending and interference. Since 1867, when Alaska was purchased from Russia, the United States has used the Pribilofs solely for the purpose of harvesting North Pacific fur seals. Sadly, the Federal Government's efforts to properly manage the islands and the seal harvest have failed to integrate the native island culture into the mainstream of American life.

Over the past decade, the Federal Government has allocated substantial sums of money, through the National Marine Fisheries Service, to supplement the meager economy of the Pribilofs and to pay for social services such as the maintenance, operation, and repair of extensive Federal facilities on the islands, including those used for fuel oil storage and delivery, and electrical power generation. In fiscal year 1983, $6.3 million was appropriated for the Pribilofs of which approximately 95 percent supports social welfare programs and only 5 percent actually supports Federal scientific research responsibilities for the fur seal. In addition, Federal expenditures on the islands account for 73 percent of all earned income on the Pribilofs. Pribilof natives have thus become heavily dependent on the Federal Government for subsidies and employment and are unable to achieve a desirable level of economic independence.

The purpose of H.R. 2840 is to assist the natives of the Pribilof Islands in achieving economic diversification and independence through livelihood not dependent on seal harvesting, and to terminate Federal administration of the islands' economy and social welfare. The bill, which was developed in close cooperation with the Department of Commerce, the Pribilof natives, the State of Alaska, and concerned environmental organizations amends the Fur Seal Act of 1966, which implements for the United States the Interim Convention on the Conservation of North Pacific Fur Seals, signed on February 9, 1957, by the United States, Japan, Canada, and the Soviet Union and which has perpetuated, for the last 17 years, the current Federal administration of the island's economy. The bill will not alter the status or nature of U.S. participation in the convention but, instead: First, authorizes the transfer of certain Federal property on the islands to native and State governmental entities; and second, authorizes a one-time appropriation of $20 million to a Pribilof Island trust fund which will be used by a trustee or trustees to facilitate the transition of the island's economy from one entirely based on Federal handouts to one which is truly self-sustaining. With the enactment of this bill, the need for an annual appropriation of almost $6 million will cease.

Since the Pribilofs are located in the rich Bering Sea fishing grounds, the potential for economic diversification and independence is significant. The $20 million appropriation, as authorized in H.R. 2840 at the request of the administration, would supplement the islands' economy during the development of halibut, king crab, and ground-fish fisheries and other industries. Such development is also contingent upon the commitment of the State of Alaska to develop adequate port and transportation facilities on the Pribilofs.

Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, when the Senate passed this bill in August, it passed an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The primary difference between the Senate- and House-passed bills were:

First, the deletion of the provision contained in the House-passed bill that required congressional review and approval, by concurrent resolution, of several documents related to the transfer of Federal properties on the islands and a memorandum of understanding between the State of Alaska, island natives, and the U.S. Government. This change was, of course, made in response to the intervening Supreme Court decision regarding congressional veto authority;

Second, the addition of language which resolves the issue of how the termination of Federal activities on the island affects Federal pension and other benefits that have been accruing to those island natives that have served as Federal employees; and Third, the addition of provisions that were intended to maintain the status quo as to the business relationship between the U.S. Government, the island natives, and private interests who have historically processed and marketed the fur seal skins resulting from the annual harvest.

It is on this last point that we in the House have taken exception to the Senate amendments and I am pleased to report that these issues have been resolved in the substitute amendment currently before the House.

One particular section of this bill that should be elaborated is section 210(b). It is our intent in this legislation to provide that all natives of the Pribilof Islands who are Federal employees on October 28, 1983, regardless of type of appointment, are eligible to transfer specified benefits should they be subsequently hired by designated, qualifying, tribal organizations. This avoids an inequity to temporary employees, some of whom have been hired by the Federal Government regularly for many years.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated, the primary reason for this legislation is the recognition of the fact that Federal administration of the Pribilof Islands has hindered the Pribilovians' development of a self-reliant economy. I believe it is time that we put a halt to this unwise use of Federal dollars and facilities and allow the Pribilovians to pursue an unfaltered path toward self-sufficiency. I, therefore, request your support and the support of my colleagues for this important legislation.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG).

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. I thank the gentleman.

I want to thank the gentleman, Mr. BREAUX from Louisiana, Mr. FORSYTHE, ranking member of the committee, for this historical legislation. I want to thank them for the consideration of this legislation which really is special interest for a small group of Alaskan citizens sorely put upon during World War II. In fact, they were included in the commission studying the atrocities of the Japanese impoundment, and they were deeply involved in it.

Actually the Government has been directly responsible for some of the poverty and the lack of accomplishment to this group of people over the years. The chairman and the ranking member have seen through this legislation an attempt to justify that so they can have a strong, sound economic base.

I again want to compliment both of these gentleman and the committee as a whole for taking up this important legislation for Americans that have been misused and now are being, I would say, compensated to some degree, but more than that, given the ecomomic grounds to continue a sound, broadened, diversified economy other than one which we fostered upon them.

Again, I do urge the passage of this legislation.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I rise in support of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before us today is intended to remove the Federal Government from the responsibility for administration of the social welfare programs which govern the day-to-day lives of the Pribilof Islanders. This would be accomplished through the appropriation of $20 million to the Secretary of Commerce for release to a trust to assist in the economic development of the Pribilof Islands. In fiscal year 1983, $6.3 million was appropriated to carry out Federal responsibilities on the islands, with approximately 95 percent of this money going to support social welfare programs. The trust would assume the major share of those programs under this legislation.

I am supportive of the thrust of this legislation and believe it represents a significant step forward. I expect that the Department of Commerce, the State of Alaska, and the Pribilof Islanders will proceed in good faith and with all deliberate speed to develop and implement the necessary documents called for in this legislation in order for the trust to work. I also expect that this legislation will provide additional impetus for the residents of the Pribilof Islands to diversify their economy such that the islands will no longer be dependent upon sealing.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that we could not have reached this point without the cooperation and assistance of the administration, the members and staff of both the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Senate Commerce Committee, the State of Alaska, the Pribilof Islanders, and representatives of the environmental community. I know that the task of reaching agreement on a final bill was time-consuming hard work for all those involved. The fact that we are at this point today is an excellent demonstration of the ability of individuals with different perspectives on an issue to work together for common goals.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the House amendment to the Senate amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983".

SEC. 2. The Act of November 2, 1966 (Public Law 89-702; 16 U.S.C. 1151-1187), known as the Fur Seal Act of 1966, is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE I—FUR SEAL MANAGEMENT

"SEC. 101. (a) 'Commission' means the North Pacific Fur Seal Commission established pursuant to article V of the Convention.

"(b) 'Convention' means the Interim Convention on the Conservation of North Pacific Fur Seals signed at Washington on February 9, 1957, as amended by the protocol signed in Washington on October 8, 1963; by the exchange of notes among the party governments which became effective on September 3, 1969; by the protocol signed in Washington on May 7, 1976; and by the protocol signed in Washington on October 14, 1980, by the parties.

"(c) 'Cure' or 'curing' means the performance of those post-harvest activities traditionally performed on the Pribilof Islands, including cooling, washing, removal of blubber, soaking in brine, draining, treating with salt or boric acid, and packing in containers for shipment of fur seal skins.

"(d) 'Fur Seal' means the North Pacific Fur Seal, Callorhinus Ursinus.

"(e) 'Import' means to land on, bring into, or introduce into, or attempt to land on, bring into, or introduce into, any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whether or not such landing, bringing, or introduction constitutes an importation within the meaning of the customs laws of the United States.

"(f) 'Natives of the Pribilof Islands' means any Aleuts who are permanent residents of the Pribilof Islands, or any organization or entity representing such natives.

"(g) 'North Pacific Ocean' means the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the thirtieth parallel of north latitude, including the Bering, Okhotsk, and Japan Seas.

"(h) 'Party' or 'parties' means the United States of America, Canada, Japan, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

"(i) 'Person' means any individual, partnership, corporation, trust, association or any other private entity, or any officer, employee, agent, department, or instrumentality of the Federal Government, of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government.

"(j) 'Pribilof Islands' means the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, Walrus and Otter Islands, and Sea Lion Rock.

"(k) 'Sealing' means the taking of fur seals.

"(l) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Commerce.

"(m) 'Take' or 'taking' means to harass, hunt, capture, or kill, or attempt to harass, hunt, capture, or kill.

"SEC. 102. It is unlawful, except as provided in this Act or by regulation of the Secretary, for any person or vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to engage in the taking of fur seals in the North Pacific Ocean or on lands or waters under the jurisdiction of the United States, or to use any port or harbor or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States for any purpose connected in any way with such taking, or for any person to transport, import, offer for sale, or possess at any port or place or on any vessel, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, fur seals or the parts thereof, including, but not limited to, raw, dressed, or dyed fur seal skins, taken contrary to the provisions of this Act or the Convention, or for any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to refuse to permit, except within the Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States, a duly authorized official of Canada, Japan, or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to board and search any vessel which is outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and which is subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to determine whether such vessel is engaged in sealing contrary to the provisions of said Convention.

"SEC. 103. (a) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who dwell on the coasts of the North Pacific Ocean are permitted to take fur seals and dispose of their skins after the skins have been officially marked and certified by a person authorized by the Secretary: Provid- ed, That the seals are taken for subsistence uses as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1379), and only in canoes not transported by or used in connection with other vessels, and propelled entirely by oars, paddles, or sails, and manned by not more than five persons each, in the way hitherto practiced and without the use of firearms. This authority shall not apply to Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos while they are employed by any person for the purpose of taking fur seals or are under contract to deliver the skins to any person.

"(b) Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos who live on the Pribilof Islands are authorized to take fur seals for subsistence purposes as defined in section 109(f)(2) of the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, as amended (16 U.S.C.1379), under such conditions as recommended by the Commission and accepted by the Secretary of State pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Secretary.

"SEC. 104. The Secretary shall (1) conduct such scientific research and investigations on the fur seal resources of the North Pacific Ocean as he deems necessary to carry out the obligations of the United States under the Convention, and (2) permit, subject to such terms and conditions as he deems desirable, the taking, transportation, importation, exportation, or possession of fur seals or their parts for educational, scientific, or exhibition purposes.

"SEC. 105. (a) The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations with respect to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands and on lands subject to the jurisdiction of the United States as he deems necessary and appropriate for the conservation, management, and protection of the fur seal population, and to dispose of any fur seals seized or forfeited pursuant to this Act, and to carry out the provisions of the Convention, and shall deliver to authorized agents of the parties such fur seal skins as the parties are entitled to under the Convention.

"(b) The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements with any public or private agency or person for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Convention and of this title, including but not limited to the taking of fur seals on the Pribilof Islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom.

"(c) The Secretary shall give preference to the village corporations of Saint Paul and Saint George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203) for the taking of fur seals on the village corporations' respective islands, and the curing and marketing of the sealskins and other seal parts, and may retain the proceeds therefrom. Any proceeds therefrom will be deposited in a separate fund in the Treasury and will be available to the Secretary, subject to appropriations, for the purpose of this section. All seal harvests will be financed, to the extent possible, from proceeds collected in preceding years or unsold assets retained from harvests conducted in preceding years. In the event that such assets and proceeds are insufficient, as determined by the Secretary, to finance the seal harvest in accordance with the requirements of the Convention, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary for fiscal year 1984, and for fiscal year 1985 and beyond if the Convention is extended by protocol signed by the parties and made effective as to the United States, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the harvest and curing on the Pribilof Islands. Such amounts as are determined by the Secretary to exceed amounts required to carry out this section shall be transferred to the General Fund of the Treasury.

"SEC. 106 (a) Any person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act who has reasonable cause to believe that any vessel outfitted for the harvesting of living marine resources and subject to the jurisdiction of any of the parties to the Convention is violating the provisions of article III of the Convention may, except within the areas in which another State exercises fisheries jurisdiction, board and search such vessel. Such person shall carry a special certificate of identification issued by the Secretary or Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating which shall be in English, Japanese, and Russian and which shall be exhibited to the master of the vessel upon request.

"(b) If, after boarding and searching such vessel, such person continues to have reasonable cause to believe that such vessel, or any person onboard, is violating said article, he may seize such vessel or arrest such person, or both. The Secretary of State shall, as soon as practicable, notify the party having jurisdiction over the vessel or person of such seizure or arrest.

"The Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, upon request of the Secretary of State, shall deliver the seized vessel or arrested person, or both, as promptly as practicable to the authorized officials of said party: Provided, That whenever said party cannot immediately accept such delivery, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating may, upon the request of the Secretary of State, keep the vessel or person in custody within the United States.

"(c) At the request of said party, the Secretary or the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, shall direct the person authorized to enforce the provisions of this Act to attend the trial as a witness in any case arising under said article or give testimony by deposition, and shall produce such records and files or copies thereof as may be necessary to establish the offense.

"SEC. 107. The President shall appoint to the Commission a United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may appoint one Native from each of the two inhabited Pribilof Islands to serve as Advisors to the Commissioner and as liaisons between the Commissioner and the Natives of the Pribilof Islands. The President may also appoint other interested parties as Advisors to the Commissioner. Such Advisors shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The President may also appoint a Deputy United States Commissioner who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. The Deputy Commissioner shall be the principal adviser of the Commissioner, and shall perform the duties of the Commissioner in the case of his death, resignation, absence, or illness. The Commissioner, the Deputy Commissioner, and the Advisors shall receive no compensation for their services. The Commissioners may be paid travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at the rates authorized by section 5 of the Administrative Expense Act of 1946 when engaged in the performance of their duties.

"SEC. 108. The Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Secretary, is authorized to accept or reject, on behalf of the United States, recommendations made by the Commission pursuant to article V of the Convention.

"SEC. 109. The head of any Federal agency is authorized to consult with and provide technical assistance to the Secretary or the Commission whenever such assistance is needed and reasonably can be furnished in carrying out the provisions of this title. Any Federal agency furnishing assistance hereunder may expend its own funds for such purposes, with or without reimbursement.

"TITLE II—ADMINISTRATION OF THE PRIBILOF ISLANDS

"SEC. 201. The Secretary shall administer the fur seal rookeries and other Federal real and personal property on the Pribilof Islands, with the exception of lands purchased by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service under section 1417 of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487) or acquired or purchased by any other authority after enactment of the Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983 and, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, shall ensure that activities on such Islands are consistent with the purposes of conserving, managing, and protecting the North Pacific fur seals and other wildlife and for other purposes consistent with that primary purpose.

"SEC. 202. In carrying out the provisions of this title, the Secretary is authorized—

"(1) to operate, maintain, and repair such Government-owned property, both real and personal, and other facilities held by the Secretary on the Pribilof Islands as may be necessary; and

"(2) to provide the employees of the Department of Commerce and other Federal agencies and their dependents, at reasonable rates to be determined by the Secretary, with such facilities, services, and equipment as he deems necessary, including, but not limited to, food, fuel, shelter, and transportation.

"SEC. 203. The State of Alaska will be responsible for meeting the educational needs of the citizens of the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 204. The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall provide medical and dental care to the Natives of the Pribilof Islands with or without reimbursement, as provided by other law. He is authorized to provide such care to Federal employees and their dependents and tourists and other persons in the Pribilof Islands at reasonable rates to be determined by him. He may purchase, lease, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities, supplies, and equipment as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this section; and the costs of such items, including medical and dental care, shall be charged to the budget of the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as superseding or limiting the authority and responsiblity of the Secretary of Health and Human Services under the Act of August 5, 1954, as amended, or any other law with respect to medical and dental care of natives or other persons in the Pribilof Islands.

"SEC. 205. (a) Any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary notwithstanding, the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating, is authorized to bargain, grant, sell or otherwise convey, on such terms as he deems to be in the best interests of the United States and in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, any and all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the property, both real and personal, held by the Sercretary on the Pribilof Islands: Provided, That such property is specified in a document entitled 'Transfer of Property on the Pribilof Islands: Descriptions, Terms and Conditions,' which is submitted to the Congress on or before October 31, 1983.

"(b) The property transfer document described in subsection (a) shall include, but need not be limited to—

"(1) a description of each conveyance;

"(2) the terms to be imposed on each conveyance;

"(3) designation of the recipient of each conveyance;

"(4) a statement noting acceptance of each conveyance, including the terms, if any, under which it is accepted; and

"(5) an identification of all Federal property to be retained by the Federal Government on the Pribilof Islands to meet its responsibilities as described in this Act and under the Convention.

"(c) Within 60 days of the transfer of real or personal property specified in the document described in subsection (a), the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate shall be given a report prepared by the Secretary stating the fair market value at the time of the transfer of all real and personal property conveyed.

"(d) A Memorandum of Understanding shall be entered into by the Secretary, a representative of the local governmental authority on each Island, the trustee or trustees, and the appropriate officer of the State of Alaska setting forth the respective responsibilities of the Federal government, the Trust, and the State regarding—

"(1) application of Federal retirement benefits, severance pay, and insurance benefits with respect to Natives of the Pribilof Islands;

"(2) funding to be allocated by the State of Alaska for the construction of boat harbors on St. Paul and St. George Islands;

"(3) assumption by the State of Alaska of traditional State responsibilities for facilities and services on such islands in accordance with applicable laws and regulations;

"(4) preservation of wildlife resources within the Secretary's jurisdiction;

"(5) continued activities relating to the implementation of the Convention;

"(6) oversight of the operation of the Trust established by section 206(a) to further progress toward creation of a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent on commercial fur sealing;

"(7) the cooperation of government agencies, rendered through existing programs, in assisting with an orderly transition from Federal management and the creation of a private enterprise economy on the Pribilof Islands as described in this Act; and

"(8) such other matters as may be necessary and appropriate for carrying out the purposes of the Act, including the assumption of responsibilities to ensure an orderly transition from Federal management of the Pribilof Islands.

The Memorandum shall be submitted to Congress on or before October 31, 1983.

"(e) The grant, sale, transfer or conveyance of any real or personal property pursuant to this section shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State or local taxation. The basis for computing gain or loss on subsequent sale or disposition of such real or personal property for purposes of any Federal, State or local tax imposed on, or measured by revenue shall be the fair market value of such real or personal property at the time of receipt.

"(f) In carrying out the purposes of this Act, the Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements, including but not limited to land exchange agreements with other Departments and Agencies of both the State and Federal Governments, and with third parties, notwithstanding any provision of law relating to the transfer and disposal of Federal property to the contrary; except that the authority of the Secretary of the Interior regarding exchanges involving lands in the National Wildlife Refuge System on the date of enactment of the Fur Seal Act Amendments of 1983 is not affected by this section.

"(g) The Secretary shall submit to Congress a report, no later than October 1, 1983, providing information on the status of the negotiations for concluding the documents described in subsections (a) and (d) of this section.

"SEC. 206. (a)(1) In order to promote the development of a stable, self-sufficient enduring and diversified economy not dependent on sealing, the Secretary shall cause to be established a Trust for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, to be known as the 'Pribilof Islands Trust' (hereinafter referred to as the 'Trust').

"(2) All amounts appropriated to the Secretary under subsection (e) of this section shall be transferred by the Secretary to the trust within fifteen days after submission of the Trust instrument to Congress in accordance with the requirements of subsection (c).

"(3) Except as provided in subsection (e)(2), none of the amounts transferred to the Trust pursuant to paragraph (2) shall be distributed by the trustee or trustees for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands until 30 days after submission to Congress of the documents described in section 205 (a) and (d). Such distributions shall be made by the trustee or trustees only after the Secretary has determined that such trust has been established and will be operated in accordance with a trust instrument, or instruments, approved by the Secretary which further the purposes and policies of this Act.

"(4) Until the termination of the period described in paragraph (3), the trustee or trustees shall invest the amounts transferred pursuant to paragraph (2) in securities with maturities suitable for the needs of the Trust, bearing interest rates at rates determined by the trustee or trustees, taking into consideration average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The income from such investments shall be credited to, and form a part of the Trust.

"(b) The Trust shall be administered in accordance with such terms and conditions as are prescribed by the Secretary, and as set forth in the Trust instrument. In establishing such terms and conditions, the Secretary shall consult with the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, and other interested parties concerning the conservation, management and protection of the fur seal population.

"(c) There may be one Trust instrument establishing the Trust described in Section 206(a), or two such instruments, each relating to one of the two portions of the Trust as provided in subsection (d), which shall address, but need not be limited to, such matters as—

"(1) establishing standards and procedures for the disbursement by the trustee or trustees of trust assets for purposes of fostering in the Pribilof Islands a stable, diversified, and enduring economy not dependent upon sealing after Federal management of the islands is terminated, which procedures may include formal participation of Pribilof Island Native councils, corporations, or other such entities;

"(2) establishing the Secretary as trustor;

"(3) establishing the procedure for appointment of the trustee or trustees by the Secretary after consultation with the Natives of the Pribilof Island;

"(4) setting forth the rights, duties, powers and obligations of a trustee who shall act as an independent fiduciary and who shall be a United States citizen having recognized competence in business;

"(5) providing for the management and investment of Trust assets, pending distribution, by an investment manager or advisor, who may be the trustee, having recognized competence in such fields;

"(6) establishing methods and procedures for providing Congress and the Secretary with the annual reports described in subsection (g) of this section;

"(7) establishing Trust purposes in accordance with the purposes described in section 201 of this Act and subsection (a) of this section;

"(8) the duties of the trustee or trustees and the standards of care and diligence that shall govern the exercise of trust powers thereunder;

"(9) compensation of the trustee or trustees;

"(10) the term, termination and final distribution of the Trust estate;

"(11) mandating the applicability of the laws of the State of Alaska to the creation and governance of the Trust; and

"(12) defraying of community expenses; and

"(13) payment of necessary administrative and legal expenses.

The Trust instrument or instruments described in this subsection shall be submitted to Congress on or before October 14, 1983.

"(d) The Trust shall be divided into two portions pursuant to a formula established by the Secretary after consultation with the natives of both Islands, to be accounted for separately for the independent benefit of the community of St. Paul and the community of St. George.

"(e) (1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary $20,000,000 for the purpose of funding the Trust in accordance with the requirements of subsection (a)(2) of this section.

"(2) Prior to the termination of the period described in subsection (a)(3) of this section, the trustee or trustees may make interim distributions for the benefit of the Natives of the Pribilof Islands, upon approval of the Secretary, of up to five percent of the amounts transferred to the trust pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section if, as determined by the Secretary, such interim distributions are required to carry out the purposes of this Act.

"(f) The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any asset or obligation held in the Trust shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust.

"(g) The trustee or trustees shall submit to Congress and to the Secretary an annual report, the first of which is due on April 30, 1984, and subsequent reports on the same date each year thereafter during the life of the Trust, providing information on expenditures made from the Trust and progress towards achieving the purposes set out in subsection (a) of this section. On April 30, 1986, the Secretary shall also submit a report to the Congress detailing all progress toward achieving these purposes since enactment of this Act. For purposes of preparing such report, the Secretary by regulation may require that the trustee and the State of Alaska submit such relevant information to the Secretary as he deems appropriate.

"(h) The funds appropriated to the Trust and the earnings and distribution therefrom shall not be subject to any form of Federal, State or local taxation: Provided, That this exemption shall not apply to any income from the investment or other use of such distributions.

"SEC. 207. The Secretary is authorized to enter into agreements or contracts or leases with, or to issue permits to, any public or private agency or person for carrying out the provisions of the Convention or this Act.

"SEC. 208. (a) Service by natives of the Pribilof Islands engaged in the taking and curing of fur seal skins and other activities in connection with the administration of such islands prior to January 1, 1950, as determined by the Secretary based on records available to him, shall be considered for purposes of credit under the Civil Service Retirement Act, as amended, as civilian service performed by an employee, as defined in said Act.

"(b) The annuity of any person or the annuity of the survivor of any person who shall have performed service described in subsection (a) of this section, and who, prior to November 2, 1966, died or shall have been retired on annuity payable from the civil service retirement and disability fund, shall, upon application filed by the annuitant within one year after November 2, 1966, be adjusted, effective as of the first day of the month immediately following November 2, 1966, so that the amount of the annuity shall be the same as if such subsection had been in effect at the time of such person's retirement or death.

"(c) In no case shall credit for the service described in subsection (a) of this section entitle a person to the benefits of section 11(h) of the Civil Service Retirement Act.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act or any other law, benefits under the Civil Service Retirement Act made available by reason of the provisions of this section shall be paid from the civil service retirement and disability fund subject to reimbursement to such fund from the Operations, Research, and Facilities Account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, for the purpose of compensating said retirement fund for the cost, as determined by the Civil Service Commission during each fiscal year, of benefits provided by this section.

"SEC. 209. Chapter 83 of title 5, United States Code, is amended as follows:

"(a) by deleting 'Credit' in section 8332(b) and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'Except as provided in paragraph (13) of this subsection, credit';

"(b) by adding in section 8332(b) after paragraph (12) the following new paragraph:

'(13) one year of service to be credited for each year in which a Native of the Pribilof Islands performs service in the taking and curing of fur seal skins and other activities in connection with the administration of the Pribilof Islands, notwithstanding any period of separation from the service.';

"(c) by adding in section 8332(b) after 'paragraph (3) of this subsection.' the following sentence: 'The Office of Personnel Management shall accept the certification of the Secretary of Commerce or his designee concerning service for the purpose of this subchapter of the type performed by an employee named by paragraph (13) of this subsection.';

"(d) by adding in section 8332(f) after 'postal field service' the words 'and service described in paragraph (13) of subsection (b) of this section,';

"(e) by adding in section 8332(l)(1) the word 'or' at the end of clause (v) of subparagraph (B) thereof and by adding the following new subparagraph:

'(C) is of Aleut ancestry and while a citizen of the United States was interned or otherwise detained in, or relocated to any camp, installation, or other facility in the Territory of Alaska which was established during World War II for the purpose of the internment, detention, or relocation of Aleuts pursuant to any statute, rule, regulation, or order;'; and

"(f) by amending paragraph (4) of section 8334(g) by striking 'January 1, 1950' and substituting the words 'October 29, 1983,' and adding after 'the Pribilof Islands' the words 'except where deductions, contributions, and deposits were made before October 29, 1983'.

"SEC. 210. (a) Title I of the Act of January 4, 1975, Public Law 93-638 (25 U.S.C. §§ 450-450m), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, is amended by adding in section 105(e) after 'to be employed by a tribal organization' the words ', the city of St. Paul, Alaska, the city of St. George, Alaska, upon incorporation, or the Village Corporations of St. Paul and St. George Islands established pursuant to section 8 of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (Public Law 92-203)'.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Native of the Pribilof Islands employed by the Federal government on October 28, 1983, shall be deemed to have been covered under chapters 81, 83, 85 and 87 of title 5, United States Code, on such date for the purposes of determining eligibility for continuity of benefits under section 105(e) of the Act of January 4, 1975 (Public Law 93-638), known as the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.

"SEC. 211. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

"TITLE III—ENFORCEMENT

"SEC. 301. (a) Every vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States that is employed in any manner in connection with a violation of the provision of this Act, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores shall be subject to forfeiture; and all fur seals, or parts thereof, taken or retained in violation of this Act, or the monetary value thereof, shall be forfeited.

"(b) All provisons of law relating to the seizure, summary and judiciary forfeiture, and condemnation of a vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores for violation of the customs laws, the disposition of such vessel, including its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores or the proceeds from the sale thereof, and the remission or mitigation of such forfeitures shall apply to seizures and forefeitures incurred, or alleged to have been incurred, under the provisions of this Act, insofar as such provisions of law are applicable and not inconsistent with the provisons of this Act.

"SEC. 302. (a) Enforcement of the provisions of this Act is the joint responsibility of the Secretary, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating. In addition, the Secretary may designate officers and employees of the States of the United States to enforce the provisions of this Act which relate to persons or vessels subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. When so designated, such officers and employees are authorized to function as Federal law enforcement agents for these purposes; but they shall not be held and considered as employees of the United States for the purpose of any laws administered by the Office of Personnel Management.

"(b) The judges of the United States district courts and United States magistrates may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue such warrants or other process, including warrants or other process issued in admiralty proceedings in Federal district courts, as may be required for enforcement of this Act and any regulations issued thereunder.

"(c) Any person authorized to carry out enforcement activities hereunder shall have the power to execute any warrant or process issued by any officer or court of competent jurisdiction for the enforcement of this Act.

"(d) Such person so authorized shall have the power—

"(1) with or without a warrant or other process, to arrest any person committing in his presence or view a violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder;

"(2) with a warrant or other process or without a warrant, if he has reasonable cause to believe that a vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or any person onboard is in violation of any provision of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder, to search such vessel and to arrest such person.

"(e) Such person so authorized may seize any vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, together with its tackle, apparel, furniture, appurtenances, cargo, and stores, used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder or which it reasonably appears has been used or employed contrary to the provisions of this Act or the regulations issued hereunder.

"(f) Such person so authorized may seize, whenever and wherever lawfully found, all fur seals taken or retained in violation of this Act or the regulations issued thereunder. Any fur seals so seized or forfeited to the United States pursuant to this Act shall be disposed of in accordance with the provisions of section 105 of this Act.

"SEC. 303. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 304. (a) Any person who knowingly violates any provision of this Act or of any permit or regulation issued thereunder shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $20,000 for such violation, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"(b) Any person who violates any provision of this Act or any regulation or permit issued hereunder may be assessed a civil penalty by the Secretary of not more than $10,000 for each such violation. No penalty shall be assessed unless such person is given notice and opportunity for a hearing with respect to such violation. Hearings held during proceedings for the assessment of civil penalties authorized by this subsection shall be conducted in accordance with section 554 or title 5. The Secretary may issue subpoenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of relevant papers, books, and documents, and administer oaths. Witnesses summoned shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena served upon any person pursuant to this paragraph, the district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found or resides or transacts business, upon appplication by the United States and after notice to such person, shall have jurisdiction to issue an order requiring such person to appear and give testimony before the Secretary or to appear and produce documents before the Secretary, or both, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. Any civil penalty assessed may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary for good cause shown. Upon any failure to pay a penalty assessed under this subsection, the Secretary may request the Attorney General to institute civil action in a district court of the United States for any district in which such person is found, resides, or transacts business to collect the penalty, and such court shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide any such action.

"SEC. 305. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the operations, research, and facilities account of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in the Department of Commerce, such sums as may be necessary, up to $2,000,000, for fiscal year 1984 for the purpose of upgrading Federal property to be transferred pursuant to section 205 of this Act, $736,000 for fiscal year 1984 for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act and such sums as may be necessary for each fiscal year thereafter for the purposes of sections 104 and 208 of this Act.

"(b) The contract authority of the Secretary under this Act is effective for any fiscal year only to the extent that appropriations are available for such purposes."

Mr. BREAUX (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House amendment to the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE ROBIN TALLON

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable ROBIN TALLON:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., September 23, 1983.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you, pursuant to the provisions of House Rule L (50), that two employees of mine, David Perkins and Kenneth Rush, have received a deposition subpoena in Benjamin D. Moore, Petitioner Coxe Leasing Corporation v. Carolina Container, Inc. In both instances, the subpoenas related to their official duties.

I will undertake to make the determinations required by the Rule and communicate them to you.

Sincerely,

ROBIN TALLON,
Member of Congress.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken on Tuesday, September 27, 1983.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT TEMPORARY EXTENSION

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3962) to extend the authorities under the Export Administration Act of 1979 until October 14, 1983, as amended.

H.R. 3962

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 20 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. App. 2419) is amended by striking out "September 30" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 14".

SEC. 2. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Department of Commerce for the fiscal year 1984 such sums as may be necessary to carry out the Export Administration Act of 1979.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this motion becomes necessary because the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983 is legislation that is currently before the House, but the Export Administration Act of 1979, the current law, is due to expire on September 30.

On Thursday the House debated the rule for H.R. 3231, which is the extensive with amendments, of the Export Administration Act, and that measure is due for debate on the House floor today. Sometime during the course of the week we will take up amendments under the 5-minute rule.

Our concern is not that we may be unable to complete legislative action on the bill, H.R. 3231, during the course of the week, but that the other body may not be able to take up and complete action for a comparable measure during the week.

Not only do we have to successfully adopt our respective measures, but the conference may take several additional days.

So, given the fact that both bodies need more time to deliberate on legislation to extend the Export Administration Act and the fact that we will undoubtedly have a conference which could involve 2 or 3 additional days, it makes necessary this unanimous consent request to extend the present Export Administration Act until October 14.

I am certain that there would be no objection.

At this time I would like to yield to the ranking member of the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade for whatever comments he may have.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

As I see it, this extends the Export Administration Act to October 14. October 30 is a better date. October 14 is a very awkward date, Mr. Speaker. The reason I say that is because, as I understand it, from the 7th of October to the 14th of October this House will not be in session. It would essentially give us less than 2 weeks to work on this very complicated legislation.

This legislation has to go through the House, it has to go through the other body, and then the conferees must act on it.

We have some extremely important and delicate matters in this legislation. Some issues are going to be very heatedly debated.

This legislation has an open rule and I know of at least 25 amendments that are going to be coming before the House. With an open rule, and more than 25 amendments, I can see this debate extending for more than 1 or 2 weeks. We would have 1 week to work with the other body in conference and get it back here.

I think it is impractical and not workable in this fashion. I think that the date has to be changed to some other date than October 14, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I have to state some of the same concerns as the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) has stated.

The Chairman knows that it is an extremely controversial piece of legislation. Not only is it controversial within the Members of this House but the version that the other body is reporting is entirely different than ours and I have the same concerns.

I would like to just ask the chairman in a colloquy, in a friendly nature, what happens if this does bog down and we have not had the bill itself signed into law by October 14? What are the ramifications if that should happen?

Mr. BONKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLOMON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BONKER. I appreciate the concern raised by both the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON), both of whom have devoted considerable effort to this legislation.

The extension is necessary not because there is not ample time allowed for House action on the measure this week. Given the fact that we have a limited legislative schedule and the fact that the continuing resolution may keep us in until late Friday, we are bound to have some empty time on the floor.

So my concern is not so much with the House having enough time to fully debate and consider the amendments to be offered and completing action on Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983, but in case the other body does not act on a bill in time to allow enough room for a conference to take place.

Now, if we discover next week that there is insufficient time for a conference, then I rather imagine we can go through another unanimous consent request to extend the current act another few weeks to allow time for a conference to take place.

Mr. SOLOMON. If I may ask the chairman, I still am very much concerned just for example, I think October 2, which is a Saturday, there are a number of members of the Foreign Affairs Committee who are scheduled to take part in a NATO conference in Europe and they do not even plan to be here during that week, this coming week. Therefore we really only have just 4 working days.

I am just concerned that I guess my question is why can we not change it and place the extension date to October 30? Then we would all feel safe about it and we would not have any concern.

Mr. BONKER. Let me put the gentleman's mind at rest. There is no way that we will be taking up this legislation in conference while we are in a recess. If we are to break on October 7 then we certainly will not have a conference.

All Members, especially those who are appointed conferees, ought to participate fully in the conference debate.

My concern is that we are able to expedite action on this legislation. The Export Administration Act is due to expire on September 30. If we do not expedite our work it is possible that it might be even extended indefinitely.

I rather imagine if we extend it to October 30 that we would end up right down to the wire as we are now in trying to take up the matter in the last few days.

There is no way now that we can amend this motion to suspend the rules on the floor and I would hope that the gentleman would go along with the request and then next week if it looks like we have insufficient time to take up this issue in conference, then we will ask for another extension by unanimous consent.

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the chairman for his remarks. I certainly appreciate the chairman. He does an excellent job in his capacity as chairman of that subcommittee.

But again I still have to raise this concern. I do not see why we could not come back tomorrow with a unanimous-consent request for this same bill with an October 30 date. There are many of us that will not be here next week and who will be participating in that amendment process. With the Lebanon resolution on the books, with the continuing resolution, I am just afraid that we are not going to get finished.

I will be personally very uncomfortable, and so will many Members on this side of the aisle, if we are unable to complete the amendment process on that legislation. I do not see any reason why we could not extend this.

I hate to oppose the bill but certainly I am going to ask everyone on this side of the aisle to do it, again with no reflection on the chairman because, unless the chairman can tell me why he could not come back here with a unanimous-consent suspension bill in the next couple of days which would give us until October 30, when we would all feel very comfortable, then I would support the gentleman's bill at that time.

Mr. BONKER. Let me say first of all the concern has been not so much with inadequate time on the House floor for debate on the Export Administration Act this week.

I am informed that we only have two major bills, one dealing with the continuing resolution which will probably come up later in the week, and the second being the foreign affairs resolution concerning the War Powers Act and the stationing of troops in Lebanon.

I think about 3 or 4 hours is being allocated for debate on that issue.

So I believe that we have more time than we need, even with all of the amendments that are being proposed, to fully debate and consider the Export Administration Amendments Act this week.

My concern has been more with the probability of a conference and what might or might not take place in the other body. But I do think extending the act until October 30 will give us time that is not necessarily needed on the House floor to debate this issue.

If anything, it might just extend the possible time that we would take up the measure.

I know the gentleman (Mr. SOLOMON) has legitimate concerns, but I do think the leadership has allowed sufficient time to fully debate the issue this week.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, to tell you the truth if somebody objected to the extension of this act, I suppose I would not weep great tears because I think the act is unnecessarily stringent, and reflects adversely on our trading opportunities.

But, I would be surprised if those who would want to make it stricker would oppose the extension which the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) is suggesting.

Obviously we cannot have a blank period with no legal control over exports.

For that reason I will support the gentleman's motion, even though I think the current act is one which needs amending rather than extending. But I would say, with the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) that long extensions simply give rise to long debate and much head faking between the other body and this one.

If it is necessary to extend it again, I am certain the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) will be in here to give us such a motion. But in the meantime I think we should keep pressure on both ourselves and upon the other body. I think the gentleman's motion should be sustained.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade.

Mr. ROTH. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one thing crystal clear, this is the most important piece of trade legislation to come before this body this session of Congress. We must give adequate consideration and not be forced to debate these amendments under duress of time, the "rush to judgment" that so often takes place.

So I think while we will be constrained to go along with our chairman's proposal, I think we want to also make it very clear that this is not going to constrain us in any way from offering amendments or debating amendments to the fullest. We realize that it is very easy and convenient to get an extension of time and we are acting in the understanding that the chairman will do so.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BONKER. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

The gentleman (Mr. ROTH) has raised legitimate concern. I want to personally assure him and the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) that if it looks like we do not have ample time, I will be the first one to request another extension

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in reluctant support of this bill for the reasons noted in my presentation earlier. I simply want to say that I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) that we ought to have plenty of time to work on the bill and I can assure him that I will probably have as many amendments as he does, although they may be taking a little different direction.

I am not sure I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) that it is the most important piece of trade legislation. It is important all right but it is probably better described as antitrade legislation. Because it is important to our security in this country, we have to think it through very carefully.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3962, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 297 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 3231.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3231) to amend the authorities contained in the Export Administration Act of 1979, and for other purposes, with Mr. SEIBERLING in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) will be recognized for 45 minutes, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) will be recognized for 45 minutes, the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD) will be recognized for 15 minutes, and the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. COURTER) will be recognized for 15 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would like to commend the ranking member of the subcommittee from the State of Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) for his continuing efforts and cooperation in behalf of this legislation. He has noted on more than one occasion that this is not only the most important trade bill to come before Congress in this session, but it is one of the most complex pieces of legislation that we will be considering this year.

It is also terribly important, Mr. Chairman, because it brings into conflict two important national policy imperatives. On the one hand the United States bears a heavy responsibility as a global power. We have to develop policies that protect our national security interests, that carry out our strategic concerns, and that attempt to deal with foreign policy matters. This is a unique responsibility that we in the United States must bear, one which is not fully carried by other countries, particularly those in the Western sphere.

U.S. policies, short of war, have often placed the burdens of carrying out these global objectives on the backs of our business community because, invariably, it results in the placement of economic sanctions upon our exporters as a means of dealing with foreign policy matters.

At the same time the United States is discovering that our domestic economy is no longer sufficient to meet our growth needs in the future.

At the same time we find ourselves in a fiercely competitive world economy with Japan and other countries challenging America's preeminence in a number of areas.

The United States must be more competitive; we must enhance our export opportunities.

The fact is that since 1960 our share of world markets has been declining rapidly. In 1960 we had 18 percent of that share and that is now down to 12 percent and declining every year.

If one were to measure our export performance against the GNP, we would find ourselves sadly lacking against other countries.

It is now down to 7.5 percent of our GNP compared to a much higher percentage displayed now in Canada, Japan, West Germany, and other countries.

Last, Mr. Chairman, let me note that exports has become a jobs issue. The Department of Commerce has estimated that for every $1 billion in exports we create somewhere between 25,000 and 30,000 new jobs.

So it is no longer a matter of exporting jobs, it is a matter of generating jobs.

The legislation that is before the House, Mr. Chairman, attempts to address all of these concerns, the concerns that we have to protect our national security interests, to make sure that our technology is not any way directly or indirectly contributing to the military capability of adversarial nations.

We have also attempted to deal with the complex subject of foreign policy and how we attempt to deal with foreign controls in such a way that we do not necessarily inhibit our economic performance in the world marketplace.

The subcommittee has heard from a variety of witnesses, both in the public and private sectors; we have attempted to find a way to balance these national policy objectives, and I think the legislation before us has done that very successfully.

□ 1240

With respect to foreign policy controls we have added provisions that would require the President to consult with other countries before imposing foreign policy controls in the future.

The problem invariably has been that whenever the United States, through its President, attempts to punish the Soviet Union for misbehavior, we generally do it without prior consultation, and therefore we impose sanctions without the cooperation and support of friendly nations.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3231. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for his fine work in bringing the bill before the House.

Tomorrow I will offer an amendment to the bill that would ban the importation of Soviet gold coins into the United States. Over the past 4½ years, the Soviet Union has exported nearly $46 million worth of gold coins into our country to raise much-needed hard currency for trade with the West. In light of the Soviet massacre of 269 innocent persons on board Korean Air Lines flight 007, this ban is but one of a number of measures we should take to show that there will be no business as usual until the Soviet Union changes its course as an outlaw nation. Let us stop the sale of this blood money to pay Soviet fighter pilots to shoot down civilian airliners.

Mr. BONKER. I thank the gentleman and he can be assured that the House will consider his proposal later in the week.

Mr. Chairman, let me resume my comments about prior consultation. I think our European allies would be more likely to support our foreign policy goals, even if they include export sanctions, as long as they were made party to those deliberations and the final decision on whether or not to apply those controls in the future.

The bill before us also deals with the problem of existing contracts and the fact that in the past when Presidents have attempted to use foreign policy controls they have proved to be destructive to contracts that are already in force. We have found that members in the private sector have been the real victims whenever these controls were attempted in the past.

So we have added to an existing provision in law relating to agricultural commodities to limit the President's authority in the future to impose controls which terminate contracts for foreign policy reasons.

The Congress may grant authority to interrupt existing contracts in the future. Our exporters have discovered that they, as a result of foreign policy controls in the past, are now seen as unreliable suppliers. In other words, other countries and companies are reluctant to do business with the United States simply because of our past track record and the fact that oftentimes these contracts can be terminated at the whim of the President.

We have also attempted to deal with the problem of extraterritorial foreign policy controls. We found in the past that when the President exercised this authority and took the extra step by extending those controls to U.S. subsidiaries located in other countries, that quite often placed these companies in a serious dilemma. They were either potentially in violation of our law, which ordered them to terminate contracts, or they were potentially in violation of another country's law which in effect said honor those contracts. This has been an unbearable and unwarranted burden that has to be borne by U.S. subsidiaries.

Mr. Chairman, while there is something of an emerging consensus within the business community that foreign policy controls simply do not work, they have never worked in the past for any country, they certainly have not worked for us, the result has always been to punish not the Soviet Union or another country that is the target of these controls, but to place the burden wholly upon our U.S. manufacturers and exporters. And oftentimes they and not the Soviet Union are the victims of foreign policy controls.

So there is a consensus I think that is now shared by many inside the administration that these foreign policy controls do not work. If the President ever felt inclined to use those controls, he would have in the aftermath of the Korean airliner incident. That, probably more than any other single event, has aroused America's patriotism and need to retaliate and yet, the President himself stops short of imposing trade controls as a retaliatory measure.

But within the national security section of the bill we find that the attitude within the business community, indeed, everywhere and among all those who testified before the committee, is that we need effective national security controls. They should be an integral part of this country's strategic policy.

So, we, in no way, have attempted to take away those controls or to reduce the commitment we have to controlling the transfer or the sale of technology or the use of technology for military purposes that would enhance the military capability of an adversarial nation.

The reforms that are in this bill are simply intended to expedite licensing procedures and enable us to concentrate on that technology that has significant military and civilian application. I think it is terribly important that we underscore that fact. We find that the present system which attempts to control 100,000 to 200,000 items, has proved so burdensome for our Government and others who cooperate in controlling high-technology items, that we have really diverted our attention from high technology that could actually move out of our country and into the hands of the Soviet Union.

So these reforms, I think, are essential. They strike an important balance between the Department of Commerce, that generally is in favor of exporting, and the Department of Defense, which really has a vigilant attitude about what ought to be exported.

What we have attempted to do in this legislation is to take some of the existing regulations and actually codify them by placing them into the act. I am talking basically about the distribution and the project licenses which allow multiple shipments under one license, so that exporters do not have to continually go back for individual licenses.

We have added a new comprehensive operations license that will allow multiple shipments of goods and technology from U.S. parents to subsidiaries, thereby eliminating the need for licensing of day-to-day transactions by companies, particularly those who have an established record of complying with national security controls.

The committee is attempting to eliminate, insofar as possible, the volume of licenses now required. The Department of Commerce issues anywhere between 75,000 and 80,000 licenses a year, which is cumbersome and costly for our Government and burdensome to the business community.

We can effectively do this by eliminating licenses for shipments to Cocom countries. That includes basically member nations of NATO plus Japan. We have found that the track record involved in shipments to Cocom countries is very good, at least as good as it is with Canada where we do not license exports, without any threat or compromise to our national security.

So one of the major reforms in this bill is to eliminate licensing requirements for shipments to Cocom countries.

The bill also decontrols items subject to unilateral control which have been approved consistently over the past year. If a particular piece of equipment has been approved time and time again, it is obviously in circulation worldwide. It is something that has exceeded the state of the art, yet we continue to require licenses which often require delays and uncertainty for our exporters.

So we see this as another essential reform, which is one that does not compromise our national security interests.

The committee also has discovered that we can decontrol goods with microprocessors, embedded microprocessors, so long as that item is used strictly for commercial purposes. Of course, if it has any potential military application, then the Secretary retains the authority to control it.

And, last, under national security controls, Mr. Chairman, let me mention that foreign availability continues to be a serious problem for our Government and for our exporters. There is nothing that frustrates exporters more in their efforts to export their equipment than when they discover they are being denied a license or they are subjected to delays in the licensing procedure while their competitors in another country are not restricted. They know that foreign availability exists, and there is really nothing they can do about it. The present law provides some procedures for dealing with foreign availability, but they have proved ineffective. Technical advisory committees, which are already established by law, were created to advise on foreign availability. In the Export Administration Amendments Act we provide that technical advisory committees must inform the Secretary, as well as the Congress, whenever there is an example of foreign availability. The Secretary would have 90 days in which to make a determination as to whether or not foreign availability exists. And if foreign availability does exist, the Secretary then can negotiate with the country involved to bring about control of that item from that particular country. The Secretary would have 6 months in which to conduct those negotiations. If he fails to have the item controlled in the other country, then it will automatically be decontrolled in this country, thereby allowing the exporter to compete.

Now, the point here I think is fairly obvious. The purpose of the law is to prevent the flow of certain technology into countries that are potential adversaries. We are not being effective in that policy if the item is available without control from another country. If we continue with the present policy and disallow our exporter access to that market while his competitor from a foreign country does have access and actually gets the sale, then we have not denied anything to the potential adversary, and the only result has been to deny our exporter access to the market.

Mr. Chairman, a few words about enforcement of the Export Administration Act. There were concerns expressed before the committee on all sides that the Department of Commerce has not been terribly effective in its enforcement program I do not think that charge can be denied, but in the past the Department of Commerce has lacked the essential funding and personnel resources to do the job. They have lacked the authority to do an effective job. So instead of trying to support another agency's efforts in the enforcement area, the committee, working in concert with the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) and other members of the Ways and Means Committee, has attempted to develop an enforcement program that provides essential authority to the Department of Commerce and gives it the personnel and the resources necessary to do the job. We have provided a more tightly defined role for the Customs Service so that it can continue its work on illegal exports, but we avoid the possible overlapping of these two Federal agencies in dealing effectively with export control matters.

We have increased penalties for violators of this act. We have also made conspiracy to export an explicit offense, thereby broadening the network of parties subject to penalties. I think that we have done an excellent job in dealing effectively with export enforcement in the law.

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of additional provisions in the bill. Time does not allow me to comment on all of them. But I am certain that during the course of our debate and the proposed amendments, we will have an opportunity to focus on other provisions in the Export Administration Amendments Act.

Let me briefly say that there is a new section under title III that deals with both investment and imports and the implementation of the so-called Sullivan Principles in South Africa.

Under the short-supply control authority, we extend the existing prohibition on the export of Alaskan crude oil unless certain conditions are met. We extend the President's authority to impose other short-supply controls. We have worked out very effective compromises in most of these areas.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3231, to extend the authorities of the Export Administration Act.

I commend the chairman, Mr. DON BONKER, the ranking minority member, Mr. TOBY ROTH, and the other members of the Subcommittee of International Economic Policy and Trade for their diligent work in drafting this legislation, which received the overwhelming support of the full committee.

H.R. 3231 has been carefully designed to clarify U..S export control policies so as to restrict goods and technology which could be of significant benefit to the military capability of the Soviet Union and its allies.

The gentleman from Washington, the chairman of the committee, has adequately and fully explained the bill, so I will merely take this time to sum up the provisions.

The bill seeks to focus export controls on the higher range of technologies and relax content on those which are no longer significant or unique. Most West-West trade should be decontrolled, which will remove a taxing bureaucratic burden and permit the licensing process to concentrate on the more complicated, higher technology license applications.

H.R. 3231 seeks to overcome some of the problems which have accompanied the use of foreign policy export controls, specifically the grain embargo of the Soviet Union and the gas pipeline sanctions. The bill more clearly defines the criteria which should govern the use of export controls to further U.S. foreign policy, particularly that such controls should not be unilateral but should be imposed in conjunction with our allies. Emphasis is also placed on the foreign availability of goods and technology being controlled. The bill restricts the extraterritorial application of U.S. foreign policy export controls, unless there is specific authorization from the Congress, and provides for sanctity of contract.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3231, while maintaining essential export controls, is designed to remove unnecessary impediments to U.S. exports and therefore to assist the creation of jobs here at home. Maintaining the economic strength and vitality of the United States and our allies is as much in the security interest of the United States as is depriving the Soviet Union of some new technology. H.R. 3231 represents a careful balancing of these two important national goals; it permits the restriction of exports which could be of military benefit to our enemy or enemies but seeks to avoid unnecessary controls which would restrict U.S. exports to no real advantage.

I urge the Members to support the bill.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to thank the chairman of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) for his excellent work and for his graciousness and fairness and helpfulness in our many, many, many hearings that we had on this legislation.

I also want to thank the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for his comments.

Our subcommittee held an innumberable number of hearings and meetings, and a great deal of time was put into this legislation by our subcommittee members, Ms. SNOWE, Mr. BEREUTER, Mr. MICA, Mr. BERMAN, Mr. BARNES, and Mr. WOLPE. All of these people spent countless hours on this legislation, and I want them to know how much I appreciated their support and help, and also the majority staff members who did so much work.

I, as a new member on this committee, knew little about the Export Administration Act, and 95 percent of the people in this body are in the same situation. Believe me, there are many issues here and it takes a lot of hours to consider them carefully. It is like going back to graduate school to study this and work on this legislation.

I also want to thank my minority counsel, Harold Luks, for his excellent work and the countless hours he put into this legislation.

There are more than 65 sections to this bill, and it is one of the most controversial, technical, and complicated bills to come before this Congress this session. This legislation severely restricts the President's ability, as I see it, to regulate exports for reasons of national security, foreign policy and short supply.

Long before the brutal Soviet attack on the South Korean flight 007, I was deeply disturbed by several sections of this legislation. The Presidency as an institution must have the flexibility and authority to conduct foreign policy and protect the national security. Congress and the Presidency share responsibility for making trade policy. That policy is more important today than at any time in our history. Everyone involved in this debate is committed to strengthening our position in the world economy. Export controls are necessary to protect national security and to conduct foreign policy.

We are convinced that export controls are necessary to protect our national security and are necessary to conduct our foreign affairs and our foreign policy. The brutal Soviet murder of 269 innocent victims and the entire spectrum of Soviet conduct demonstrate the importance of preserving our foreign policy and national security by export controls.

But the EAA is not just devoted against the Soviet Union and is not designed against the Soviet Union solely. It is designed to enable the United States to conduct foreign policy by giving the President the ability to express his revulsion in a nonmilitary way, be it any country, whether it is Libya, Iraq, Syria, or any other country. The President did not use his authority under the Export Administration Act to reply to the brutal murders, but I ask my colleagues, who would vote to deny him that option, which is what we are doing here?

But that is precisely the approach that this bill is taking, to deny the President that option. Moreover, in the present form, this bill makes it easier for the Soviet Union to acquire Western technology. Who in the House would go on record favoring reductions in export controls or the transfer of militarily significant goods and technology to the Soviet Union or any other adversary? Export controls on sales to the Soviet Union are not the issue, really.

In a letter to President Reagan, the former distinguished chairman of our subcommittee, Mr. Jonathan Bingham, wrote this. He said:

> In my view, circumvention of U.S. and multilateral export controls has contributed more to Soviet military capabilities than the technology approved for sale.

You will hear that reductions in national security export controls by reducing or eliminating the license of exports or lifting controls on entire categories of goods and technologies will improve the operation of export controls. You will hear that foreign policy export controls do not work.

In this legislation, the major issues are buried in a mountain of technicalities, but I urge my colleagues to examine the facts and to draw their own conclusions.

Congress has amended our export control law now five times since 1969, and each time the amendments were approved to provide answers to four basic questions, and we want to take a look at those questions, because as amendments come to the floor we have to have that critiera, we have to have a target to shoot at, and these are the four questions that have always been asked, and these are the four questions that we must ask again:

First, how to reduce national security export controls to truly militarily significant items.

Second, how to simplify the export licensing procedures so they are not a burden on American business.

Third, what is necessary to improve the United States and multilateral enforcement of export controls; and Fourth, to insure that the President and Congress fully examine the imposition of foreign policy export controls before they take effect.

There are no easy answers. But weakening national security controls and denying this country the option of effective foreign policy controls is not the answer. In this debate, we should evaluate proposed changes to the act by a set of objective criteria. The 1979 Foreign Affairs Committee report identified four criteria. They were valid then and they are valid today as standards to evaluate amendments to the act. Do the amendments:

First, reduce controls;

Second, increase enforcement and the scrutiny devoted to items under controls;

Third, simplify licensing; and Fourth, establish procedures and criteria for foreign policy controls.

Although there are significant objections to several sections of the bill, let me emphasize my support for many parts of this legislation. In particular, H.R. 3231 requires completion of a list of militarily critical technologies; it strengthens the Paris-based coordinating committee on national export controls, composed of NATO countries minus Iceland and Spain plus Japan, which recommends to its members controls of strategic goods and technologies; creates a statutory basis for four types of multiple export licenses; expands the kind of acts to be considered violations of the law and increases the penalties for violations; strengthens the hand of the Department of Commerce to arrest violators and seize goods; spells out detailed provisions for prior consultation between Congress and the President regarding the imposition of foreign policy controls, for which we are indebted to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON); and provides for sanctity of contracts except in cases of immenent or actual aggression, gross violations of human rights, international terrorism and nuclear weapons tests. Each one of these provisions in the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983 is an improvement over the current law. Each of these provisions meet the criteria with which we must judge changes to the present law.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to emphasize my support for many sections of the legislation—precisely because they meet these criteria. Those sections which beef up enforcement, increase penalties, identify militarily critical technologies to narrow controls and reduce licensing, provide for multiple licenses, and set the stage for close prior consultation between Congress and the President regarding foreign policy controls—all improvements over the present law.

In fact, if the House approved just these provisions, our export control law would be greatly improved.

Mr. Chairman, over the past decade the scope of export controls has been reduced. The list of items controlled multilaterally by the United States with our partners in Cocom has been substantially reduced. The number of items we control unilaterally has undergone a dramatic reduction. I will not come before the House and defend the position that a number of items for which we require licenses is perfect. It is not perfect.

Developing a list of militarily critical technologies goes a long way toward answering the question of what goods and technologies should be subject to export controls. The bill we are considering requires completion of a militarily critical technologies list. This MCTL would be integrated into the actual list of controlled items administered by the Commerce Department. It would result in a thorough, overhauled and reduction in the U.S. national security controls as contained in our commodity control list. The MCTL provision also requires that the General Accounting Office embark on a similar undertaking to guarantee that Congress has a second opinion on what is essential to control for strategic reasons. Finally, it incorporates a list of criteria to consider in determining what is indeed militarily critical—criteria developed by a highly distinguished panel of scientists, intelligence, and military specialists, including the former Under Secretary of Defense, William J. Perry.

Here then is a comprehensive review of U.S. export controls and procedures to meet the criteria for amending the Export Administration Act.

But the legislation goes much further—and in dangerous directions.

I do not question the motives of those who support the bill in its present form. Unless the result of this debate corrects certain deficiencies, I cannot see the President signing this legislation—or the next President accepting its restrictions. I cannot help but wonder about the reactions of Presidential hopefuls Mondale, GLENN, HOLLINGS, HART, CRANSTON, and Askew as to the provisions contained in this bill.

Mr. Chairman—in addition to the unnecessary restrictions imposed on trade with South Africa in title III—after careful and exhaustive examination of this legislation, I am compelled to conclude that three sections are damaging to this country's national security and will endanger U.S. efforts to improve multilateral export controls. They do not meet the standards to evaluate changes to the Export Administration Act.

COCOM LICENSING

First, the bill eliminates the requirement that U.S. exporters obtain validated licenses for shipments to most NATO countries and Japan. Eliminating licensing would have a devastating effect on multilateral export controls. Who can disagree that the United States is the conscience of Cocom and chief advocate of export controls. It would limit export licensing to a few questionable companies whose names would be published by the Commerce Department. If you vote for this amendment, you vote to deny the Government the opportunity to investigate export licenses applications and to deny exports to suspected countries—controlled or cooperating—with the Soviets before the goods leave the United States. Notifying the Government, as the bill requires, as the goods sail away serves little purpose.

Here is a partial list of "red flags" or warning of illegal exports: Our enforcement of export controls is the most comprehensive within the Western alliance. Can you imagine their status in other countries. In West Germany, the entire Federal Office for Trade and Commerce was staffed by only 146 civil servants.

INDICATIONS OF POTENTIAL ILLEGAL EXPORTS

Listed below are some of the "red flag" indications that signal possible illegal exports or diversions. The listing is not exhaustive; it is provided by the Department of Commerce, Office of Export Enforcement, as an aid to further public awareness and the private sector's effort to combat illegal exportation of U.S. technology.

1. Customer's/purchasing agent's reluctance to provide end-use or end-user information;

2. Performance/design requirements incompatible with destination country resources or environment, or with consignee's line of business;

3. Stated end-use incompatible with the customary or known industrial applications for the equipment being purchased;

4. Stated end-use incompatible with consignee's line of business;

5. Stated end-use incompatible with the technical capability of the consignee or destination country;

6. Customer willingness to pay cash for a large value item or order;

7. Little or no customer business background information available;

8. Apparent lack of customer familiarity with the commodity's performance/design characteristics or uses;

9. Customer's/purchasing agent's declination of installation or service contracts that are normally accepted similar transactions;

10. Ill-defined delivery dates or the use of delivery locations inconsistent with the type of commodity or established practices;

11. Use of freight forwarders as ultimate consignees;

12. Use of intermediate consignee(s) whose location/business is incompatible with purported end-user's nature of business or location;

13. Packaging or packing requirements inconsistent with shipping mode and or destination; and

14. Evasive responses to questions regarding any of the above as well as whether equipment is for domestic use, export or reexport.

Even a subcommittee on export controls of the President's Export Council—an industry advisory group—did not recommend eliminating West-West export controls.

Another report revealed that the United States is the only country to maintain a denial list of unreliable end users.

The GAO does not favor the elimination of licensing. This section reduces licensing by eliminating it—simplifies licensing by not requiring it—but cripples enforcement.

If we do not strengthen the warning of the late Senator Henry Jackson, whom we all admired so much and who was a real expert in this area, would ring even truer than it does today, when he wrote: "Our export control system is in a shambles." The United States and its allies have been selling the rope to the Soviets. What we have not sold we have been giving away in educational, governmental, and technical exchange programs. What we have not sold or given away, they have been stealing. Do we want this state of affairs to continue?

What good does it do us to spend here in this body billions and billions of dollars in research and development to protect our national security and then allow the Soviets to build their military machine on our high technology.

UNILATERAL CONTROLS

Second, is the section on unilateral controls. We control 31 categories of goods and technologies unilaterally. U.S. companies can not sell them without an approved export license. In 1982, more than 10,500 licenses were approved to non-Communist countries—38 were denied. Unilateral controls cover elements used in biological and chemical warfare; nuclear weapons, missile weaponry, engines used by in large in naval vessels; and electronic countermeasure equipment, to name a few. For many items there is no foreign availability.

The provision before us is designed to end these controls. We have the opportunity to replace this section with an amendment which meets the criteria for changing the present law and recognizes the military applications of these items.

FOREIGN AVAILABILITY

Third is the problem of foreign availability. What international negotiation was ever concluded in 6 months? That is the deadline imposed by the bill on the President to negotiate the elimination of foreign availability for goods and technologies subject to licensing requirements. Even negotiations within Cocom take 2 years or more to add or delete items from the control list. Six months is clearly too short a time period for technically involved negotiations to eliminate foreign availability.

We are committed to strengthening Cocom, but this provision weakens Cocom and may place the United States in violation of Cocom by eliminating licensing for items controlled by Cocom.

Foreign availability sounds simple, but it is not. It involves technical comparisons which are time consuming, complex, and costly. And let me add that in many instances investigations to evaluate foreign production confirmed the superiority of the U.S. product thus reinforcing the need for our export controls.

EXTRATERRITORIALITY

There is only one other provision which is of great concern. Foreign policy controls have three aspects: Exports from the United States, interruption of contracts, and extending control to foreign subsidiaries and U.S.-origin components in foreign made goods. It is extraterritoriality: extending export controls to U.S. subsidiaries and to U.S. goods and technologies already sold overseas.

Twice the House debated repeal of this authority. Twice the Congress confirmed its intention to delegate this authority to the President. During the 1979 debate, our distinguished former colleague Jonathan Bingham accepted an amendment deleting a provision repealing extraterritorial controls. That debate clearly examined this authority for both reasons of national security and foreign policy.

Extraterritoriality is an important aspect of foreign policy controls. It is beyond belief that in the wake of the destruction of flight 007, and other acts by the Soviets, Libyans, Iranians, and others that we would strip away the effectiveness and scope of foreign policy controls. Mr. Chairman, recently the New York Times eloquently made the case for foreign policy controls. Using Libya as an example, the New York Times summed up the issue.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 26, 1983]

ON GIVING QADDAFI THE BUSINESS

Will Colonel Qaddafi collapse if Washington refuses to let him buy an American system for mooring and loading tankers offshore? Hardly. But who could imagine authorizing this sale when Libya's reckless strongman has just launched another military adventure, this time against Chad? That's the dilemma of the economic sanctions game. Each case offers difficult choices and uncertain results.

Sofec Inc., a Houston company owned by Britain's Vickers Ltd., has requested an export license for a $40 million mooring system it would design, construct and install in Libya. The Reagan Administration is torn with indecision, having only last week approved Caterpillar's sale of $90 million in pipelaying equipment to the Soviet Union. Remember, not so many months ago President Reagan threw the Western allies into turmoil by embargoing sales of such equipment for the Russians' European gas pipeline.

In other words, it's hard to enunciate a principle for the use of economic sanctions. If they work, the world's leading democracy comes off looking like a bully. If they don't, and that's often the case because the embargoed product can be bought elsewhere, America comes off looking petulant—and American producers suffer. The futile grain embargo against the Soviet Union tells it all.

Sanctions continue to be invoked, though, and recent research indicates that they can be effective.

The Institute for International Economics, a policy study group in Washington, analyzed 78 campaigns by various countries for various purposes and found that about 40 percent were effective.

Economic coercion has played a part in the eventual downfall of Governments in Rhodesia, Chile, Nicaragua and Uganda in the past dozen years. Less dramatically, Arab pressure kept Canada from moving its Israeli Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

President Carter banned sales of American military equipment to Libya five years ago, retaliating against Colonel Qaddafi's terrorist activities overseas. In 1981 President Reagan pressed American oil companies to get out of Libya, and in 1982 stopped importing that country's oil. Last December, in a deal much larger than Sofec's moorings, Boeing was barred from selling 12 commercial jets to Libyan Arab Airlines for $600 million.

Washington's objective in Libya is clear enough: contain the colonel, at least. He persists, and there's no sign he's been weakened. If he can't have our offshore moorings to make his oil shipments more efficient, he can surely get such equipment elsewhere.

But sanctions have value nonetheless. For reasons of price or design, he'd apparently rather buy American. To deny him the Sofec moorings would be at least a frustration, and an appropriate way for America to show him our contempt.

When all is said and done the business community opposes foreign policy controls. They impose costs upon the United States. A very strong case can be made that foreign policy controls, in certain instances, do not pass the test of a cost-benefit analysis. Yet, it is easier to calculate their cost, as opposed to their influence on a foreign government.

To date, no one has attempted to seriously evaluate the widespread use of foreign policy controls by the United States and other countries. A soon to be released major study of foreign costs doubt on the charge that they do not work. "Perhaps surprisingly," the study reads, "Sanctions have been successful in 40 percent of the cases. The success rate depends on the type of goal." Defining such goals is the task of Congress and the President and this bill spells out for the first time the terms for prior consultation to define these goals.

The study says sanctions must be comprehensive and timely. This provision makes foreign policy controls weak and belated. Can you imagine, if the sanction were at all controversial, Congress enacting a law giving the President extraterritorial authority in a timely basis? Would it take a week, month, 2 months, 3 months—assuming that we are in session? The bitter critique of extraterritoriality by the sponsors of this legislation does not ring with conviction. They would deny the authority to the President and they apply the same extraterritorial reach to South Africa.

Mr. Chairman, the differences over this bill are of substance—not ideology. I do not believe that the best interests of American business and national security are incompatible. This legislation can be improved to take into account and balance both interests. I will offer, and others will offer, amendments to make this a reality. Its going to take a lot of work and patience. Its going to mean reviewing the nitty-gritty of export controls.

The control issue in this debate is not international trade and the effect of export controls on American business. Let me quote from the National Academy of Sciences which summed up the problem we must address:

There is no question that the overall loss of U.S. technologies . . . to the Soviet Union has been extensive . . . such acquisition have permitted the Soviet military to develop countermeasures to Western weapons, improve Soviet weapon performance, avoid hundreds of millions of dollars in R&D costs, and modernize critical sectors of Soviet military production.

Now, we all realize that no one has a monopoly on technology nor a monopoly on know-how, but we in the West have been ahead of the Soviets in technology. Technology is a moving target; it is not something that is static.

What I am saying is that we do not want to deny to our commerce and industry a chance to trade and to sell overseas and to be competitive. All I am saying is that we want to stay ahead of the Soviet Union in technology, and that means that we have to delay their chance to get hold of this technology. That means that we have to tighten up the sieve that is around Cocom. That means that instead of loosening our controls, we have to tighten up on our controls.

This August a $600,000 U.S. computer was exported to Belgium. It was Cocom controlled. Soon thereafter it was illegally shipped to Hungary. That is what export controls are all about—and why we must strengthen—not weaken—our export control law.

What is the use of us in this body spending billions on research and development if we are just going to open up the floodgates and tell the Soviets or any other country to come here and pick out what they want?

I think what we want to do is to pick out our highest technology and make it more difficult for our adversaries to get that highest technology, but, at the lower end of the pyramid, loosen up so that business can compete.

Mr. Chairman, that is our goal, that is our objective, and, hopefully, with the help of the Congress and with an open mind to these amendments, we can arrive at this conclusion.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. BERMAN).

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3231. This legislation accomplishes a most difficult task. It furthers each of many fundamental interests that often conflict when the United States controls exports.

The bill reduces restraints on American trade while it strengthens security controls on technology transfers to the Soviet Union and its allies.

The act affirms the use of nonviolent economic measures to respond to world crises, while it provides new protections against such measures being imposed arbitrarily.

The legislation eases the burden of Government regulation on exporters while it gives enforcers new authority.

The subcommittee chairman, Mr. BONKER, has led a careful investigation of the effects of the Export Administration Act. No one has listened with greater patience and fairness to witnesses representing a wide variety of interests. No one knows the act better. Yet Chairman BONKER has been most gracious in enabling those of us who are new to the complexities of the export control law to become familiar with it and to participate fully in its renewal and reform.

This legislation will reduce diversion of militarily critical technologies to the Soviet Union. These leakages result primarily from theft and espionage—from criminal circumvention of licensing requirements. This legislation therefore amends current law to broaden and strengthen the Government's criminal enforcement capabilities, as well as raise penalties for evasion.

American national security interests and trade interests both suffer from overly cumbersome licensing requirements. The proposed legislation would remove unnecessary and outdated restrictions, and would enable enforcement authorities to focus on the truly critical technologies.

Among the bill's measures to modernize and streamline national security controls are:

Provisions for multiple shipments under one license;

Removal of licensing requirements for shipments of jointly controlled goods to our NATO allies and Japan; and Requirements that Commerce act on license applications within 30 days.

The United States has been far too slow in updating its national security controls list. Goods and technologies remain on the list long after they are readily available to the Soviet Union from a variety of other sources. Such controls contribute nothing to national security. They only serve to hamper American companies' ability to compete in a field where they would naturally lead: high technology.

This bill contains a number of measures to remove unnecessary and outdated national security controls. These measures include:

Decontrol of goods for shipment to a country group if all such shipments have been routinely licensed for 1 year;

Required reviews by Commerce of foreign availability of controlled items, with reports to Congress;

Decontrol of unilaterally controlled goods after 6 months if negotiations fail to remove foreign availability;

And decontrol of goods which currently come under control solely because they contain nonreprogrammable microprocessors.

Just as the national security control provisions of this bill further both security and trade interests, the foreign policy control provisions further both policy and trade interests.

The legislation affirms that trade controls are indeed a legitimate, nonviolent tool of foreign policy. Yet there are new protections against harmful and arbitrary uses of the tool.

A President's authority to immediately halt exports is limited to four circumstances which would clearly call for instantly effective measures. Trade controls affecting existing contracts would have to relate directly to acts of military aggression or international terrorism, gross violations of human rights, or a pending nuclear test. No one would want to remove a President's authority to respond immediately with effective export controls to such crises.

Before imposing foreign policy controls, a President would be required to consult with Congress and submit a detailed report on the effects of controls and the results of consultations with other countries and with affected industries. These requirements recognize that trade controls cannot be effective if they are not supported by a broad public consensus.

Mr. Chairman, there will undoubtedly be claims during the coming debate that this bill sacrifices too much in American foreign policy and national security interests in order to serve trade interests. Others will claim that the legislation does just the opposite. Yet I believe that if one examines the bill carefully and fairly, one will find that all these interests are furthered. I would urge my colleagues to support this act in its entirety.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. BEREUTER), a very valuable member of our committee, and one who has done much to improve this act.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3231, the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1983.

I would like to begin by thanking the gentleman from Wisconsin, the ranking member of the subcommittee, for the time and for the exceptional and conscientious efforts that both he and the chief minority staff member involved have devoted to preparation for this act, and to the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU) whose special expertise as a member of the full committee has contributed so much to the formulation of this legislation.

I thought that Chairman ZABLOCKI's exceptional comments were good preparatory remarks for the debate that will follow and I particularly want to pay tribute to the gentleman from Washington, the chairman of the subcommittee (Mr. BONKER), whose conscientious effort and extremely finely tuned knowledge of this area of the statute has been invaluable in moving the legislation to this point.

Mr. Chairman, America was built into the world's foremost economic power by the backbreaking labor of millions of small business owners, farmers, and ranchers. Current governmental export control policies, however, threaten to break the backs of many of these hardworking individuals and firms. By destroying their ability to compete effectively in the international marketplace through confusing, inconsistent and unduly broad national security controls and ineffectual foreign policy embargoes, the Federal Government endangers the solvency of untold businesses.

A time-consuming, bureaucratic licensing maze which the Federal Government maintains encourages frustrated businesses to move overseas, costing thousands of workers here their jobs. It encourages other nations to step in to reap the economic rewards of foreign trade which we so foolishly allow to lie fallow. It causes American firms to lose the profits from foreign sales which enable them to invest more into research and development. In the final result, this chaotic process accomplishes nothing but to undermine the most potent weapon of the free world—the economic power of the United States.

The export licensing process, as it is now structured, does not work well or to our own national advantage. In an effort to deny militarily critical technology to our adversaries or in an effort to alter their behavior, we are ignoring the health of the forest while concentrating on a few trees. Adversaries are awash in supplies of items obtained from other foreign sources, yet the United States continues steadfastly to control the export of similar products. We anger our allies with distrust as we hover over them, insisting that they guard fanatically even the lowest technology goods for fear they may slip into the hands of potential adversaries.

The gentleman from California (Mr. BERMAN) just a few minutes ago has mentioned the fact, and it is a fact, that our real problem lies in theft and in espionage. As a person who spent his time in the Army involved in counterintelligence and counterespionage matters, I am very concerned about that matter, and I think somewhat knowledgeable.

This act, in fact, contributes to our problem in its current form. It needs to be revised.

For the good of our national economy and our national security, this system has to be changed without further delay.

As a member of this subcommittee, I listened to samples of frustration with our Nation's export policies from small businesses, from managers of our largest corporations, and from the agricultural sector, too. I would cite just two very common examples of the faults of this system.

On February 22 of this year, a constituent company filed with the Department of Commerce an export license application for a microprocessor equipped controlled fraction collector, a device used in chemical and biochemical applications which collects liquids which are subsequently deposited into test tubes. The company sought export approval for this product in order that it might be exhibited at a trade show in the Soviet Union. According to company officials, and I know it is a fact, many calls, many contacts were made to expedite the process.

Well, the export license was finally granted, as it was predictably to be granted, but it was approved more than 5 months later, well after the trade show. Seven weeks earlier, that trade show had happened. This incident occurred at the very time that the Commerce Department officials testified before our subcommittee and said that more than 80 percent of the licensing applications were being processed in less than 30 days. So now, the Soviet markets for this particular item are likely to go to the only competitors, the competitors from Scandinavian nations.

The 1980 Soviet grain embargo was another example of our export control policies run amok. Most of the attention, quite appropriately, was devoted to the feed grains and wheat, where our share of the Soviet market dropped from 70 percent to 19 percent and then perhaps to 17 percent. However, in the wake of the embargo, we might think about what happened to commercial contracts for 1.3 million metric tons of soybeans and soybean products which were canceled outright.

The bill we have before us today will help eliminate these inexcusable conditions. By concentrating our energies on the truly important technologies which should be kept from enemy hands, or potential adversaries, it will enhance our national security efforts immensely. Through increased emphasis on cooperation with our allies, consideration of foreign sources of supply and consultation with the Congress, the changes embodied in this bill will help to insure that our foreign policy controls will have the support of our allies and will thus be more likely to meet our objectives.

During the last 3 days, with a bipartisan group of Members of this House, I met with members of the European Parliament right here in the United States, in Virginia. We saw evidence of a willingness to move the Co-Com from a paper organization to a truly effective one in order to deal with this problem of technology leaks to potential adversaries and in order to avoid the kind of unilateralism in which we have become involved.

Now, some will argue vociferously against these changes. They are going to tell you some horror stories of widespread leakages of technology to our military opponents or of the folly of selling grain to the Soviets while their armies march through other countries. They will demand that we tighten export controls as a way to "punish" the Soviet Union for its savagery in shooting down the unarmed commercial KAL jet.

Despite their good intentions, these critics, I would contend, are wrong. This Member will predict that nothing they propose can be demonstrated to be effective in achieving the national security and foreign policy objectives they desire. Moreover, nothing yet they are likely to propose will eliminate the commercially suicidal bureaucratic nightmares I previously mentioned.

Additional paperwork and export restrictions will not move us one step closer to the objectives we seek. In fact, they are counterproductive.

A recent article in Fortune magazine noted:

> With the spread of advanced technology around the globe, the power of the United States to control the flow to the Soviet Union inexorably diminishes. Recognition of that reality can be a start toward making U.S. policy at once more effective in denying technology to the Russians and, second, less damaging to the alliance and to the American business community.

I think we must admit the limitations of the control process and eliminate controls when they prove unworkable and ineffectual. We must work with our allies, not against them, in developing these mutually beneficial processes and strengthen those that we now have.

A recent op-ed piece in the New York Times said it best:

> A revised Export Administration Act should severely limit export controls based on foreign policy—and agree not to try to extend them unilaterally to our allies. This would give added strength and credibility to whatever controls based on national security are retained in the act, permitting the alliance to concentrate on what is indeed essential for security. Backed by such sound legislation, American negotiators could begin the long and painful search for a concensus with our allies. Without such a concensus, East-West trade will continue to threaten the West by undermining the alliance itself.

For these reasons and many more that I and other Members will bring forth during the upcoming debate Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge all my colleagues in the House to join this Member in supporting this vital and carefully crafted legislation.

Again, I thank the chairman for yielding and the ranking Member for yielding me this time.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to manage the general debate on behalf of the Armed Services Committee on H.R. 3231 in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO).

The Armed Services Committee has devoted substantial effort to the issue of technology transfer over the course of the last 6 months.

On March 23, 1983, the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services appointed a full committee panel to investigate the transfer of defense related technology to foreign countries. This panel, known as the technology transfer panel, was chaired by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO) and was asked to examine the present state of the transfer of U.S. technology to foreign nations as it might impact on national security. The chairman specifically asked the panel to assess the effectiveness of existing law, including the Export Administration Act, in preventing the compromise of technology and defense items. The panel was also asked to examine the procedure by which the Departments of Defense, State, and Commerce controlled the flow of critical technologies to foreign governments.

The committee had been concerned for a long time about the problems associated with technology transfer; and after a series of revelations of illegal activity in this area, the chairman decided to form a panel to review progress in this area.

The panel held a total of eight hearings and received testimony from 22 witnesses including Members of Congress and individuals representing Government, academic associations, and the private business sector.

The panel sought to bring a balance of viewpoints to the hearings as it was clear from the beginning that the viewpoints of those who supported increased restrictions on licensing and trade of high technology goods would clash with opinions of those who viewed further restrictions as unfair restraints of trade. Consequently, the panel sought out spokesmen who could articulate both sides of the issue.

Representatives of the administration unanimously agreed that a hemorrhage of technology to the Soviet Union was occurring and that it could only be stopped by increasing trade restrictions. The administration witnesses made the point that the Soviet Union and her allies depended upon regular infusions of the latest Western technology in their weapons development programs and that intelligence-gathering agencies of the Soviet Union (GRU and the KGB) and her Warsaw Pact allies were regularly tasked to obtain this information. Subsequent classified briefings to the panel by the NSA, CIA, FBI, and DIA supported these conclusions.

Administration witnesses generally supported the existing law with certain changes but strongly opposed elements of H.R. 3231, the Export Administration Admendments Act of 1983. Specifically, the administration objected to the provision of H.R. 3231 that would prohibit national security controls on goods if the President was unable to limit the foreign availability of those goods. Additionally, administration witnesses were concerned about the provison of H.R. 3231 that would eliminate national security controls on critical technology trade between Western countries. The administration cited numerous instances of illegal diversion of U.S. high technology goods from Western European countries.

Generally, witnesses from industry favored less restrictions on trade and, consequently, supported H.R. 3231.

In general, industry witnesses recognized a need to control critical technologies but emphasized that such control should not interfere with trade with our traditional trading partners and that American industry should not be prevented from trading in certain items if these items are available from foreign sources.

Based on the investigation of the technology transfer panel, the importance of national security controls in restricting the transfer of critical technology to the Soviet Union cannot be over emphasized. A review of this issue is replete with examples of technology obtained by the Soveit Union that has improved the Soviet's military capabilities and, consequently, their threat to the United States.

We are convinced that a substantial flow of technology has occurred—even under the existing licensing procedures. Some changes incorporated in H.R. 3231 will definitely help to eliminate some of these problems—for example, the increased penalties for violating the Export Administration Act will clearly have a beneficial deterrent effect.

Other provisions of H.R. 3231, however, will exacerbate the problems we currently face. For example, eliminating the requirements for validated licenses for West-to-West trade will make the task of enforcing the Export Administration Act much more difficult.

H.R. 3231 was referred to the Armed Services Committee only for the section related to the militarily critical technologies list. The committee has reported H.R. 3231 favorably with the amendment to section 109 that attempts to clarify the authority of the Secretary of Defense to develop and maintain the militarily critical technologies list and to clarify the Secretary's role in the overall process of export controls for national security reasons.

It is obvious on the face that the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has done a remarkable job in reporting this bill. There are some very substantial improvements made to the Export Administration Act. They are well thought out and executed. The issue is very complex, but the subcommittee has obviously mastered the subject.

Mr. Chairman, I generally support the bill—it is essential that some action be taken by October—but I also believe that modifications are needed to change the sense, if not the substance, of the bill as reported. In my judgment, the bill goes too far in shifting the balance of emphasis from national security to trade.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, if I use a part of my time, can I reserve the balance of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may.

Mr. COURTER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to assist in representing the position of the Armed Services Committee with regard to this legislation.

H.R. 3231 is an important bill addressing an important issue to the Armed Services Committee. The issue of technology transfer to the Soviet Union has extraordinary national security implications. The Soviet acquisition of state-of-the-art technology through covert or overt methods adversely affects the ability of U.S. weapons systems to operate in the face of Soviet knowledge of their technological capabilities and it requires the United States and its allies to devote increased resources to research and development to insure that allied military capabilities remain ahead of Soviet capabilities.

Because of its impact on national security, technology transfer was the subject for consideration of a panel established earlier this year by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The panel, charged with investigating the extent of the impact of technology transfer on Soviet and U.S. military capabilities, is convinced that the $187.5 billion recently authorized for the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1984 is affected substantially by the flow of technology.

Were it not for the flow of technology that has occurred in the past and continues to occur, the $187. 5 billion could be used to improve our forces more rapidly to the point of being reasonably assured of providing adequate deterrence. Alternatively, the current balance of capabilities between the United States and the Soviet Union could be maintained for a lower level of defense spending. Defense spending does not exist in a vacuum. It is affected by the threat we face, and that threat has increased dramatically as a result of the Soviet's ability to rely on U.S. technology as a major resource of its own.

The panel concluded that East bloc acquisition of United States and Western technology provides invaluable and incalculable benefits to the Soviet military capabilities. Evidence demonstrates that the Soviets and their East bloc allies are mounting a dedicated, coordinated effort to acquire such technology in order to increase the capabilities of selected systems and to avoid the expenditure of millions of dollars in research and development.

The panel concluded that the majority of goods and technology are transferred to the Soviet Union through illegal and/or clandestine methods. However, the Soviets place a high priority on collection through legal means as well.

The panel received testimony from the Departments of Defense, Commerce, and State, and the intelligence community that clearly indicates the Soviets and their surrogates have embarked on a systematic and centrally directed program to acquire the latest technology of the West for incorporation into Soviet weapon systems.

The Soviet State Committee for Science and Technology establishes and identifies required technologies and attempts to acquire as much of the targeted technology as possible through legal means. When this method is not productive, the Committee for State Security (KGB) and the Intelligence Directorate of the General Staff (GRU) are tasked to obtain the technology by clandestine means.

Soviet technology targets include computers, microelectronics communications, lasers, guidance, and navigation systems, structural materials, jet engine fabrication technology, acoustical sensors and radar. As an example, it was estimated by one witness that Soviet acquisition of computer and microelectronic technology over the past decade has allowed the Soviets to reduce the U.S. lead in these technologies from 10 to 12 years in the mid-1960's to the present 3 to 5 years. We know that at least 30 percent of the known integrated circuits used by the Soviets are direct copies of U.S. design.

A former Soviet intelligence officer revealed that the acquisition of U.S. technology was assigned the highest priority for collection including the technology required for the weaving of carbon filaments to produce heat shields for ICBM reentry vehicles.

Make no mistake about the willingness of the Soviets to engage in these activities to embellish their interests. A nation that will shoot down an unarmed civilian airliner will have no compunction about using whatever means it can to acquire—legally or illegally—the technology to allow them to continue to act in such an arrogant manner. If they were not confident in their capabilities, one could only speculate as to their likelihood to act so aggressively. It is U.S. technology, at least in part, that has provided them with this bravado.

The administration has stepped up enforcement activity against illegal diversions. Seizures of illegal diversions in fiscal year 1983 are up almost 50 percent over those in fiscal year 1982. Witnesses emphasized that if they had been prohibited from requiring the licensing of some West-to-West trade (as would be the case in H.R. 3231), this record seizure rate would not have been possible.

Mr. Chairman, under the very narrow guidelines of the sequential referral, the Committee on Armed Services was only able to formally report on section 109 of H.R. 3231. That section relates only to the militarily critical technologies list or MCTL.

This bill deals with much more than just the militarily critical technologies list, and in my opinion, the Armed Services Committee should have been provided the opportunity under the sequential referral to comment on other portions of the bill relating to the broad issue of national security controls. Consequently, Mr. Chairman, although I support the bill in general—and commend the members of the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade for their efforts—I will support amendments that would move the substance of the bill as it stands back from the dangerous position I believe it would place us in.

Mr. Chairman, the Armed Services Committee made certain recommendations and we will be proposing, through the gentleman from Florida (Mr. EARL HUTTO) who is chairman of the special panel, a section that will essentially be a substitute to section 109. I urge my colleagues to listen very carefully as the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO) gives his explanation when amendments are proferred sometime later.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington. I hope he has agreed with the Armed Services Committee recommendation, but I am not sure.

Mr. BONKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and want to commend him and the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD) as well as the chairman of the task force, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO) all of whom have taken a special interest in this legislation.

I would point out that your work has been thoughtful, thorough, and, I think, responsible in view of the inherent controversies that exist in this legislation.

So I want to, on behalf of our committee, commend you for the fine work you have done.

It is my understanding that the Armed Services Committee has recommended only one amendment, and that additional amendments will be sponsored either by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO) or other members of the task force individually.

Mr. COURTER. If the gentleman will permit me to explain, we had various recommendations to the full Armed Services Committee. Those recommendations were embodied, the gentleman is correct, into one amendment.

So it is my understanding that the gentleman from Florida (Mr. HUTTO) will probably proffer that amendment when this bill is open for amendment. But it is in the form of one amendment but does embody various changes, only to section 109, of course.

Mr. BONKER. We have taken a look at the one amendment, the formal amendment by the task force on militarily critical technologies and the full committee, and on how we can integrate that within the commodity control list and make the whole process work more effectively.

We think that is a constructive step. But we have not had an opportunity to look at other amendments that may be offered on the floor.

Mr. COURTER. I can understand that and I want to certainly commend as well the gentleman from Washington who I know has spent an extraordinary amount of time nurturing this piece of legislation from the very beginning and in shepherding the legislation through the legislative process.

I have had the opportunity to listen to the gentleman testify before the panel of the House Armed Services Committee on this. I commend basically the gentleman's effort in this regard and am very hopeful that we can come to an accommodation.

I think basically the concern of the armed services panel on militarily critical technology and the gentleman's own subcommittee is the same. We want to expedite and streamline the process as well as guarantee the security of our Nation.

Hopefully during the debate process we will all come together on the same thing.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ROTH. I, too, want to congratulate the gentleman and thank him for his contributions, as well as the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD) for the contribution she has made.

I listened to the gentleman's comments very attentively and I think he and I share many of the same viewpoints and have many of the same questions about this legislation, especially in the area of national security.

So I look forward to working with the gentleman in making those corrections that I think are going to be so necessary because this is a very important piece of legislation.

Again I thank the gentleman and the other members of the panel for the time and effort they have put into this.

Mr. COURTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to thank the gentlewoman from Tennessee who served on this panel and made significant contributions.

I would like to urge all Members in this body, although sometimes the words are words of art, militarily critical technology commodity control lists, Cocom countries, diversion; and it is complicated to those people who have not followed it, we are dealing with an extremely sensitive and important area of our national security, an extremely sensitive and important area for the producer of wealth in this country as well, that is American corporations.

And it is incumbent, even though the words are strange and difficult and the issues are sometimes complex, I think it incumbent upon all Members to focus as much attention as they can on this debate and on the amendment process.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. COURTER) has consumed 13 minutes.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA).

Mr. MICA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2321, the amendments to the EAA.

This legislation does protect the national security and it does strengthen the U.S. position in international trade. And I think it starts to bring some balance to this Nation's policies when it comes to exports.

You know, it took an executive fiat, an act by the President to allow this watch or these types of watches, a little digital watch, to be exported from this country even though they are produced all around the world, because it has a little embedded microprocessor in it.

Technology is moving forward and our laws need to move forward also.

I think this legislation is designed to do that.

Now we look at military approaches to help us with international policy, and I join my colleagues in a strong defense; we look at Foreign Affairs, diplomatic approaches to exert national policy; and I commend the President and the Congress for everything they have done. But, normally when you use the military and when you use diplomatic efforts, the normal procedures have failed.

This legislation is trying to put in appropriate perspective what those normal course of events might be and how we can best handle international business.

H.R. 3231 does protect national security and it does, I think, restore some balance in our reliability and competitiveness throughout the world.

And I will acknowledge there has been a leakage of technology, but under the present law and under the new law there will be a leakage of technology and we are trying to find the ways that we can to stem this flow of illegal transfer of technology in this legislation.

I commend the chairman, Mr. Bonker, for the excellent work he has done in trying to focus on some of these problems; our ranking minority member for some of the concerns that have been raised. It is important, it does need to be stopped.

Let me remind my colleagues, under the present law and the new law, the leakage is still illegal.

I visited the Department of Commerce. I walked through every department: 80,000 applications are processed a year; 79,900 of them are routine. Less than 1 percent, 700, 800 is what we are talking about as militarily critical technologies. And we need to focus attention on that 1 percent.

We do not want to see it legally transferred if it is inappropriate for our best interests.

So we have made some changes to take some items off that list so that we can better focus on this legal and illegal effort. You know, there are two kinds of debts we are facing, the national debt $200 billion this year; and the trade debt or deficit, last year $31.5 billion, and a lot more projected for this year.

The good ship America is depicted here on this magazine cover as sinking because of one of those debts, the trade deficit.

You cannot cure one without paying attention to the other. I think this legislation starts to do this.

I have participated in writing some of the amendments and working on the legislation to make some changes. Multiple exports to noncommunist countries, those licenses are needed; a more realistic foreign availability standard, we learned very painfully when we tried to impose these controls in the pipeline situation as to what it meant. We closed down dozens of major American businesses and hundreds of secondary businesses. It is ironic, here this week we debate this bill and the pipeline will be open for business.

We have also added criteria. I joined with our colleague, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON), in saying to the President that there should be some criteria that should be placed on foreign policy controls and we have added that in this legislation.

We have tried to strengthen cooperation between the Congress and the President, which is direly in need of improvement.

We have tried to streamline the militarily critical technologies list which is very important. We have increased the provisions with regard to contract sanctity, an area that I think deserves great attention and more attention.

And I do support Chairman Bonker's effort in the trade promotion section of this legislation. I actually wish we could make it stronger and I hope the committee will move to do this in the future.

So I think exports trade policy, international trade and commerce will be the issues of the eighties; it will be part of the solution for America's domestic problems.

My State of Florida is a leader in international trade and finance and I encourage the passage of this most important legislation.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. WOLPE).

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I want to first of all pay tribute to the extraordinary leadership that has been provided by the gentleman from Washington, the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on International Trade and Economic Policy.

This is an extraordinarily complex piece of legislation that is before us, and it is really because of his leadership and guidance that we have come to the floor with as carefully a crafted bill as is before us. I think it is worthy of the support of this body.

Mr. Chairman, I am taking this opportunity to draw the attention of my colleagues to the vital restrictions on the export of Alaskan crude oil that are contained in the Export Administration Act.

Mr. Chairman, these restrictions that Congressman MCKINNEY and I proposed were overwhelmingly endorsed by both Houses of Congress with the passage of the Export Administration Act in 1979, reaffirming continuing congressional intent that Alaskan oil be developed for domestic consumption and used to insure American energy and national security. The facts were convincing in 1979. They are even more compelling today.

The provisions of section 117 of H.R. 3231 extend for 4 years the language of section 7(d) of the Export Administration Act. Under these existing restrictions, Alaskan oil may be exported or exchanged if the President reports to Congress that it is in the national interest to do so, that such a swap would result in lower aquisition costs to American refiners with at least 75 percent of savings being passed on to American consumers, that any arrangement only be made pursuant to contracts that can be terminated if our national oil supplies are interrupted or threatended and if Congress approves a joint resolution of approval within 60 days. Our subcommittee and the full Foreign Affairs Committee voted to retain these restrictions in the new authorization as it is widely recognized that there is no public justification whatsoever for a retreat from these critical protections or for any weakening of the congressional role in affecting our national policy on this important issue.

Mr. Chairman, these restrictions are supported by a great number of organizations that represent a broad cross-section of America. They include consumer, labor, energy, agriculture, and industry groups. To date, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY) and I have heard from over 235 of our colleagues in support of our bill, H.R. 1197, which would provide for an indefinite extension of the section 7(d) restrictions. There can be no doubt that this issue is of fundamental concern to almost every sector of the American population. The existing restrictions are scheduled to expire with the Export Administration Act at the end of this week. I think this issue is too important, the stakes too high—we simply cannot afford to let this happen. It is my hope and expectation that Congress will act to protect American consumers, to promote a wise and responsible energy policy and to pursue international trading practices that are truly in our Nation's best interest. The restrictions are in the law. Let us vote to keep them there.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ), who is the sponsor of title III in the Export Administration Act Amendments of 1983.

Mr. SOLARZ. I want to join my colleague from Michigan in paying tribute to the extraordinary leadership which has been provided to the House on this measure by my very good and dear friend, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

Title III of the Export Administration Act is designed to make clear that we are not prepared to continue doing business as usual with the Government of South Africa so long as it maintains its apartheid system. Title III would require all American firms with 20 or more employees doing business in South Africa to comply with a fair employment code of conduct modeled essentially on the so-called Sullivan code, which was promulgated several years ago by the Reverend Leon Sullivan of Philadelphia.

But whereas the Sullivan code is an exclusively voluntary undertaking, title III of the Export Administration Act would mandate compliance with the fair employment principles contained in that code.

I might say for the benefit of my colleagues that the Reverend Sullivan himself, the author of these principles, has strongly endorsed this legislation on the grounds that the time has come to make these principles mandatory rather than just voluntary.

Second, title III would also prohibit all bank loans to the Government of South Africa, not to the private sector, but to the government, except for programs or projects in the area of health, housing or education that are available on a nondiscriminatory basis in all areas of the country.

And third, title III would prohibit the importation of the Krugerrand, a gold-minted South African coin, into the United States. It would not prohibit the resale of those Krugerrands already in our country which are possessed by American citizens, but it would make it unlawful to import new Krugerrands into the United States.

I believe that this is a relatively mild and modest measure. It does not restrict, except for the Krugerrands, the importation of goods from South Africa into the United States.

It is a relatively mild and modest measure. It does not restrict trade with South Africa. It does not require disinvestment from South Africa, but it does make clear that we are prepared to oppose apartheid by deed as well as by word.

Some people have said that this unfairly singles South Africa out for sanction. It does not do anything of the sort. We have already applied sanctions against governments as diverse as Cuba and Uganda, including Vietnam, Iran, the Soviet Union, and Poland. In fact, in view of the sanctions we have already applied to many other human rights violators around the world, I would submit that our failure to adopt title III and to apply some mild form of sanctions against South Africa would itself be an exercise in diplomatic hypocrisy.

So I strongly urge my colleagues to resist any efforts to either delete or weaken title III when we enter the 5-minute period hopefully a little bit later in the week.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maine (Ms. SNOWE), a very valuable member of our subcommittee and one whose minority report on this bill must be read to have a true understanding of the bill.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, as we begin debate on the Export Administration Act of 1979, I would like to mention the hard work, conscientious effort and the careful consideration given this very complicated piece of legislation by the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and Trade and special credit goes to the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member.

Generally speaking, I think the committee is sending to the floor a good bill, which incorporates many of the important and legitimate changes needed to keep U.S. business from being at an unfair and unnecessary disadvantage in world commerce. A report by the General Accounting Office (GAO) last year found that almost half of the export license applications received each year—over 60,000 in 1981—could be eliminated without affecting national security. This bill addresses this problem by streamlining the licensing process in a number of ways.

The GAO report also discusses the difficulty of identifying and prosecuting export violations, particularly foreign violators. It notes that the U.S. Government has been making concerted efforts to strengthen enforcement efforts of Cocom, but that it has not met with great success.

Cocom, the Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls, was formed in 1949 when we joined with our NATO allies—excluding Iceland and including Japan—in an agreement to insure that certain categories of high technology goods with direct and indirect military application be denied to the Eastern bloc nations for the protection of Western security. The United States has a history of adherence to this agreement; many of our allies do not. As a result, the last decade has seen "a virtual hemorrhage of strategic technology to the Soviet bloc countries," in the words of one Department of Defense official. Much of this has been from businesses operating under Cocom regulations. Consequently, these companies that put export profit above the priority of Western security helped the Soviet Union to save millions of man-hours and Rubles in research and development.

The serious flaw in the present bill is that it does not address the continued leakage of strategic materials and technology to adversary nations. It does not resolve the issue of U.S. businesses being at a disadvantage in world trade because they and not their competitors abroad abide by multilateral law. I believe that we must strengthen Cocom and the security interests of the free world by establishing for the first time a penalty for evasion of Cocom regulations. I advocate the imposition of restrictions on imports to the United States of any company, subsidiary or licensee that violates multilateral national security export controls. I believe that this provision is essential to make Cocom a meaningful organization. Cocom has not been entirely effective in the past, in large part because no nation was willing to challenge the violators.

The purpose of the import control penalty that I advocate is to give the United States a strong new tool to deter and punish those companies and individuals who violate Cocom. This provision would not extend the extraterritorial reach of the U.S. Government because it would apply only to individual violators; it would not restrict imports from a country as a whole. The establishment of an import penalty provision in U.S. law would provide the President with an enforcement tool that he could use if necessary. I believe that the deterrent effect that inclusion of this provision would bring about would enhance our national security and perhaps decrease the violations in this critical area.

I am convinced that we must put Cocom violators on notice that their conduct is unacceptable and that the United States is prepared to take meaningful action against those who interpret export controls to their own advantage at the expense of Western security goals. The import penalty provision, which I intend to offer on the floor as an amendment, is a means of correcting the unacceptable situation that presently exists.

And finally, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of other amendments that will be offered here on the floor that will address or modify some of the provisions that have been included in the subcommittee as well as the full Foreign Affairs Committee.

But I do believe that special attention should be paid to one of the amendments regarding West/West trade. In other words, we have included a provision that would eliminate unilateral controls on commodities if we do not negotiate away our foreign availability within a 6-month time period.

It seems to me we are going to be allowing other nations to dictate the policies of these United States and we would be abdicating our responsibilities. It does not provide an incentive for other nations to negotiate foreign availability if they know that we only have a 6-month time period in which to do it, otherwise we unilaterally decontrol.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that I have under my own time 2 remaining minutes. Can I at this time yield those 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON)?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey does have 2 remaining minutes, and he may yield them to the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

Mr. COURTER. I thank the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, I thank both gentlemen for yielding, and I would also like to commend both the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) and the subcommittee ranking minority member, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH), for their outstanding leadership on this bill.

Mr. Chairman, we are making, in my opinion, a serious mistake if we listen only to those who have their own short-term economic interests in mind when they criticize the U.S. export control system.

The laws and policies they support, in my opinion, threaten to destroy the only nonmilitary strategy we have for responding to Soviet economic, military, and political challenges.

This is what this bill does if it is enacted: It does away with national security controls in West/West trade; it eliminates national security controls where foreign availability exists; it omits import penalties to violators of U.S. national security controls; it removes national security controls for critical goods once licenses have been in effect for a 1-year period; and it limits our authority to apply foreign policy controls extraterritorially.

I am most concerned, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, with section 108 of this bill, which will remove export controls if foreign availability is not eliminated after a 6-month period.

While the provisions require that foreign availability must first be determined to exist, this provision leaves no choice but to declare that it does. I seriously question whether actual foreign availability over U.S. products exists in most cases. The legislation sets out no criteria or standards to make such a determination. Consequently, the legislation almost certainly would declare that foreign availability does exist without regard for a foreign product's comparable quality to the U.S. commodity. From experience we know that foreign products and U.S. products are not comparable, in most every case. If they were, a determination could be made as to their content of U.S. parts, components and technical data, all of which would then require a U.S. export license for export.

The approaches outlined under this bill could be likened to comparing a 1966 Volkswagen to a new turbocharged Thunderbird and declaring there is foreign availability for Thunderbirds because both are automobiles. That is what this bill says.

Such superficial comparisons disregarded the military criticality of the item for which export controls need to be maintained for national security reasons.

Unlike the bill reported from the House Foreign Affairs Committee—and I think you all ought to listen to this because it will come up later on—the Senate bill requires comparable quality as a measure of foreign availability. The Senate bill goes further to specify what would go into determining a foreign item's comparability. Often companies tend to equate the technical capability for a country to manufacture a similar product with its actual commercial production. With this provision in effect, the administration undoubtedly would need to verify the contentions of the business community that foreign availability exists.

This exercise would result in even greater processing delays of licenses and, therefore, negate any benefits expected from passage of this provision.

I believe that this provision would wreak havoc with an ongoing process in Cocom to free up low-end technology and consider controls over new strategic technologies and equipment. It also would pose considerable problems in maintaining controls with non-Cocom countries. Any such effort proves most difficult to do, since leverage in the first place is limited except through the retention of controls.

If this provision of the bill is not amended, it will eliminate any remaining leverage we have with Cocom members.

Mr. Chairman, I will be offering amendments to bring the provisions of this bill dealing with foreign availability in the national security area in line with that Senate bill. I will offer an amendment to delete the 6-month time limitation in the bill and amendments which establish standards and criteria on the definition of "foreign availability." In light of the Korean massacre, it is essential that we tighten this open-ended loophole in this bill.

According to the intelligence community, more than 80 percent of the illegal diversions to the Warsaw Pact countries occur through West-West trade, not East-West trade. We need to tighten, not loosen, the current law in this essential area.

In summation, this bill severely weakens the U.S. ability to preserve an effective system of export controls when it affects our national security and the future of this country. Even under the present weak law the Soviets were able to produce an air-to-air missile named the Atoll, which is unquestionably a mirror image of one of our own most sophisticated missiles—the Sidewinder, and I need not tell you the name of the Soviet air-to-air missile fired by the Soviet Mig-23 when they downed flight 007, murdering 269 innocent men, women, and children—that deadly weapon was the Soviet Atoll, whose tech was partly purchased, partly exchanged, and partly stolen from U.S. high-tech resources.

I know that many of you have been lobbied hard by special interest business and industry in your individual districts—I too have felt the pressure from these special interests. This is no time to be tying the hands of this President or any other future President. We do not need 535 Secretaries of State setting foreign policy. What we do need is a President armed with the legislative authority to protect the national security of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON) has consumed 7 minutes.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, how much time do I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Tennessee has 7 minutes remaining.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER).

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) has been yielded the balance of the time of the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD).

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU).

Although the gentleman is not a member of our subcommittee, he has spent countless hours and was with us at every hearing. The gentleman was of real value and is an asset to our proceedings.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZSCHAU. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I want to congratulate the chairman, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) for the leadership that they have given this very important bill. This is an immensely serious subject that must be dealt with, and I want to commend them for the very hard work and the excellent work they have done.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the speaker in the well here, the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU), has, I believe, a better understanding of how this bill is going to impact on American manufacturers in the technology area, the business side of America, because he comes from it, and I for one hope that the Members will listen closely to Congressman ZSCHAU, because I think he is the best informed Member on this subject.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZSCHAU. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank my colleague and friend from the State of Washington, Mr. PRITCHARD, for his comments, and I support his statement about the gentleman in the well. The gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU) is not assigned to the subcommittee. He is a Member of the full committee. As noted by the gentleman from Wisconsin, he has made a valuable contribution to our understanding of this legislation. It has been noted on several occasions that the bill is technical and that it is complex. It is difficult to understand. If anyone in the Congress has fully understood all of the provisions of this bill, it is the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU), and I want to personally thank him for his contribution to perfecting the bill, for his knowledge, and for his demeanor in the committee. He certainly is an asset to the House.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Chairman, I want to begin by thanking the gentleman from Washington (Mr. PRITCHARD), the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER), and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) for their kind statements. I just hope I have enough time left now to be able to say what I had hoped to say.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, since I have inherited 7 minutes from the Armed Services Committee, I will be more than happy to allocate 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU).

Mr. ZSCHAU. I thank the gentleman for the additional time.

Mr. Chairman, this week, as we consider H.R. 3231, I believe we have a significant and unique opportunity. By adopting this bill, which was carefully crafted in the Trade Subcommittee under the skillful leadership of Chairman BONKER and ranking minority member ROTH, and then in the Foreign Affairs Committee, we have a chance to focus and strengthen those export controls that will truly enhance national security and, at the same time, streamline the control procedures so that legitimate exports can be increased and thereby create more jobs.

In essence, what we have here is a jobs bill and a defense bill all rolled into one.

During the debate on this bill we will hear charges that there has been a virtual "hemorrhaging of technology" from the United States to the Soviets, that our current export procedures are largely to blame for that, and that the proposed amendments to the Export Administration Act will eliminate vital controls and open the technology floodgates to the Russians.

I do not believe that such charges accurately reflect the whole story on this issue or present a full understanding of the impact of the bill before us.

For example, a recent report by the Office of Technology Assessment indicates that most of U.S. technology that the Soviets have gotten from the West was obtained illegally—espionage, stealing or smuggling—or from open literature, and other open sources. Tighter controls are not going to stop that. In fact, we have to understand that controlling more items and using more intricate procedures is not going to enhance national security; in fact, as Mr. MICA has suggested, trying to control too many items and requiring license applications that are routinely approved defuses our enforcement resources so they cannot be applied effectively where they are needed.

We must recognize that technology has become pervasive worldwide; that the United States is no longer the sole source of critical products and know-how. This means that we can only prevent technology from reaching the Soviets if we have strong, multinational controls. Recognizing that, this bill mandates negotiations with our closest allies, the so-called Cocom countries, to make Cocom a more effective control mechanism to eliminate undesirable transfers to the Soviets.

In the past, about 35 percent of all export license applications have been for shipments to our Cocom allies, shipments of products which they control as well. These applications are routinely approved. In fact, in 1982, of the 21,000 license applications for Cocom countries, 99.9 percent were routinely approved. That is why the GAO has described such licensing procedures as "a paper exercises, rather than a control system."

This bill, H.R. 3231, eliminates the license requirements for shipments to Cocom countries of products that those countries in turn control except—and this is very important—licenses are still required for shipments to specific customers in those countries that are felt to represent a risk of diversion. In the past, suspicions about specific end-users have been the sole reason for Cocom license denials.

Although you may hear charges that this bill decontrols West-West trade, the fact is that it does not. Rather, it appropriately eliminates, but only for our closest allies who maintain controls themselves, the license requirements for those shipments that are routinely approved anyway. But it still requires licenses when there is a risk of diversion.

Further, recognizing that the controls on items that are freely available elsewhere cannot be effective, this bill provides for greater resources to determine when such foreign availability exists and creates incentives to recognize it when it does. Let me make clear that we currently have a clear definition of foreign availability. It is the Export Administration Act as revised in 1979. By definition in that act, foreign availability only exists when an item is available elsewhere in sufficient quality and sufficient quantity to render our controls on that item useless. That is, if our controls make a difference, even though the item is manufactured elsewhere, then foreign availability clauses do not apply.

The bill before us establishes and funds an Office of Foreign Availability to make more timely determinations of foreign availability. If foreign availability is deemed to exist for an item, a 6-month deadline is set to negotiate it away or else decontrol the item. In other words, the bill mandates that in those instances where our controls are useless, we should either negotiate agreements that make them work or quit kidding ourselves and decontrol the items. Although it may give us a warm feeling that we are being tough with the Soviets when we control items that others do not, I believe that we should recognize those ineffective controls for what they are and negotiate, with a sense of urgency, multinational agreements that will make those controls effective. That is what H.R. 3231 mandates.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, because this bill employs a realistic and pragmatic approach to the export control problem which will enhance both national security and exports, I urge my colleagues to adopt H.R. 3231.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU) has consumed 6 minutes.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT).

Mr. SWIFT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to use this time to briefly focus on a small part of this very large problem and to commend the administration for the action that it is taking with regard to the Export Administration Act as it applies to the People's Republic of China.

A number of members of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, on a visit to China earlier this year, met not so much with top political people but with a number of those people in the Chinese Government who are trying to implement specific responsibilities toward achieving that nation's goal of putting in place the infrastructure necessary for them to then begin to try to become a modern, industrialized nation by the year 2000.

These were people who were actually dealing with the day-to-day effort to accomplish a job that they had been assigned in such fields as establishment of a modern telephone system, developing the ability to extract minerals, coal, for example, offshore oil, and so forth. At that level in the Chinese Government, we ran into an enormous frustration and essentially it took this form:

They would say to us: "We like very much to deal with the United States. We like very much dealing with American companies. Our problem is that we have a timetable. We have a schedule that we have to meet. We have deadlines that we have to meet, and when we sign a contract with you, we never know whether or when that contract will be fulfilled. Therefore, if we are going to meet our deadlines, we simply have to look to some of your trading competitors in Japan and in Western Europe for so much of the materials, technology, and equipment that we need if we are to get our job done."

This in spite of the fact that two Secretaries of State, both of this administration, Secretary Haig and Secretary Shultz, had assured the Chinese that we were going to do something about their special status and make trade with the United States a more reliable process. I think Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige is particularly to be commended for finally bringing that promise on the part of this administration to fruition. A new policy has been formed, and from what we understand at this point, it is a very positive, a very progressive policy. It is going to improve our overall trading relationship with the PRC, and it is going to improve, I think, our relations, the relations of this Government, with the Government of the People's Republic of China.

But in addition to that, it is going to improve enormously the ability of American industry to trade effectively with the Chinese in relation to the competition we face for that trade from a number of our Cocom allies.

I look forward to having this policy formally announced. One would hope that would occur in the next few days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT) has expired.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield an additional 30 seconds to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT).

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, this policy, when formalized, I think, is going to go a very long way, when combined with the enactment of this legislation on which the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER), has provided such inestimable leadership, toward freeing American industry to do that which it does so well, namely, to compete effectively in the sale and export of goods and materials from this country to foreign countries and do it in a way that is not going to result in any danger to our military posture.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ROTH) has 6 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) has 6½ minutes remaining.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I think every Member of this Congress and surely those who have participated in this debate want an effective law to prohibit the transfer of important knowledge and materials that would enhance the military capability of our adversaries in the Soviet Union, and they want that law to work well and work easily.

I want to talk about the current law, which, in my judgement, has turned out to be counterproductive. Three years ago, just as we are doing this year, a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs brought to the floor of this House a pretty good bill, and we had those who were concerned about our military security offer and succeed with tightening amendments which produced what I think is the mess that we have today. And that has produced what I think was well described by the gentleman from California (Mr. ZSCHAU) as an "exercise in paper-shuffling."

As we go around the world, we find that probably the No. 2 priority of American business people abroad is to get the Export Administration Act into a situation where it provides for harmless exports of American products abroad in a timely and a certain manner. It is not difficult for the large companies to work an export license through the administrative maze that is our bureaucracy, but it is almost impossible for the small companies which we are trying to get into the export business to do the same thing. The Bonker bill makes obvious and needed improvements.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I want to say three cheers for the gentleman from Washington for the work that he has done on this bill. I have traveled with him abroad. I have seen him interviewing representatives of American business firms abroad to try to figure out what their problems are; I have seen him interviewing foreign nationals and American FCS and FSO officials abroad who know something about trade. I think he has done a marvelous job.

I also believe that the other Members who have participated in this debate have also shown their knowledge and their high motivation. I think some of them are wrong, but I think all of us are trying to build the best kind of law we can for our country.

The Bonker bill makes the necessary changes—the minimum necessary changes, I might say—to give the American people some sense of a timely and certain law so they will know what they can ship and what they cannot ship.

At this point, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know of any American company or any American person who wants to give away vital secrets to our enemies. The business people are just as anxious to cooperate as we who make the laws. They simply want some certainty in the law. They do not want to wait 6 months, 1 year, 1½, or 2 years for a license while their customers' orders are lost, while their letters of credit expire, and then they are obliged to lay off personnel or even close up their businesses.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my judgment, does not go far enough. It is not a strong enough improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has expired.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished subcommittee chairman for yielding this extra time to me.

This bill does not go far enough, Mr. Chairman. If I were the sole judge, it would open up our exports considerably more, particularly with respect to contract sanctity and the application of extraterritoriality. I would remind the committee that extraterritoriality is a complicated concept, it contains 9 syllables and 19 letters, and I am sure that none of us realize the full ramifications thereof. But it is going to be the cornerstone of the debate that follows over the next couple of weeks, and I think it is important that we bear down on that legal underpinning of extraterritoriality to the bare minimum.

Mr. Chairman, I think the committee has done a good gob. I intend to offer amendments which will expand the ability of American businessmen to do business abroad without hurting our military security, but in general I can say only good things about the bill before us.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from the District of Columbia (Mr. FAUNTROY).

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the Committee on Foreign Affairs for bringing forth H.R. 3231 with its provisions in title I, section 115 and title III that would demonstrate concretely our opposition to apartheid in South Africa.

While I commend the committee for these provisions, it is imperative that we adopt the amendment that will be offered by Congressman GRAY that would prohibit all new investment in South Africa by U.S. firms or individuals.

Title I, section 115 would reinstate foreign policy controls on exports to South Africa, controls that were unwisely lifted by the Reagan administration. Title I, section 115 specifically, would prohibit all exports to the South African military and police entities, and would prohibit sales of certain computers destined for the South African Government.

Title III of this legislation would prohibit U.S. bank loans to the South African Government, except for loans made for educational, housing, and health facilities which would be available on a totally nondiscriminatory basis in areas open to all population groups. Title III would also prohibit the importation into the United States of South African krugerrands or other South African gold coins which are minted in South Africa or offered for sale by the South African Government.

These provisions are necessary if we are to begin to send a clear political message to the black majority in South Africa, as well as to the Nation and peoples of Africa, the Caribbean, and all people of conscience around the world that the United States is in support of the freedom of the people of southern Africa and is willing to put its money where its mouth is.

Mr. Chairman, our national interests require no less. However, our national interests require more. It is essential that this body go on record in even a more forceful and effective manner by supporting the amendment that will be offered by my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Congressman WILLIAM GRAY. This amendment to H.R. 3231 would ban all new investments in South Africa by American companies.

This amendment is warranted and indeed required in light of the uniquely cruel system of institutionalized racism in southern Africa and the increasing risk of serious and continued violence in southern Africa caused by the belligerence of South Africa which invites superpower confrontation. In view of the failed policy of constructive engagement toward South Africa, a policy of all carrot and no stick, it is imperative that we adopt this most sensible amendment which will put us on record in a most serious way as opposing the vicious and racist system that dominates South Africa.

Mr. Chairman, there is a congruence between U.S. political, economic, and strategic interests in the region and the moral imperative to adopt this amendment to ban all new investments by U.S. companies in South Africa.

I would urge my colleagues to heed the words of Proverbs 22: 16, "He who oppresses the poor to increase his wealth and he who gives gifts to the rich, both come to poverty," and pass the Amendment that will be offered by Congressman GRAY.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER).

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the subcommittee, for yielding me this time, and I thank him for his good work.

I hope to offer an amendment to this bill to increase the amount of money that we get from our grain sales overseas and to protect our grain reserves from raids by foreign buyers.

I would like to tell the House that our grain reserves now, with the drought and the PIK program, are at a dangerously low level. They are lower than they have been for years. One percent of the Russian military budget could buy out our entire grain reserve, and if the Russians ever woke up to this, we would be in dire trouble.

Two percent of the oil the Russians produce could buy out our entire grain reserve, leaving us bereft. Even now, we export our grains at below the cost of production and together with the grain we export, our precious soil and our water, which are diminishing.

My amendment simply would be designed not to embargo, not to do anything like that, but simply to get more money for our grain that we sell and to protect our reserves from low cost raids by foreign governments.

The excellent article appearing in this week's Washington Post by Ward Sinclair says in one instance:

But basic questions remain avoided or unasked. For example, at what point do these grain export proceeds become diminishing returns. At what cost to the American natural resource base of rich soil and abundant water do we produce food for the world. Why should the American farmer be required to subsidize a world over which he has no control and which dictates his prices?

My amendment is designed to stop the subsidization, stop the export of soil and water, at least to get the money back wherein we can replenish our soil and our water.

Mr. Chairman, I include the Washington Post article by Ward Sinclair, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 25, 1983]

BY HAWKING OUR GRAIN WE GAMBLE OUR FUTURE

(By Ward Sinclair)

American farmers are being sold down the river.

You can actually see it happening by standing in a Missouri midnight at Lock 22 on the Mississippi, right in Mark Twain's Hannibal backyard, watching a late August traffic jam of grain-laden barges waiting to be shuttled on toward New Orleans and then to overseas customers.

Sights such as this gladden the hearts of politicians and farm organization leaders who see grain exports as the road to salvation for the faltering farm economy. But on the corn and soybean farms just a stone's throw from the lock, this traffic doesn't bring the elation you might expect. There's restrained pleasure that the Russians are buying more grain again this summer, but no real sense of salvation—most farmers know better.

There is increasing evidence that the policies promoting massive exports of American farm products, down from record highs a couple of years ago but still in the $35 billion range this year, have only worsened the crisis in U.S. farming.

The crisis is social, economic and environmental. The pressure to produce more and more food is rapidly changing the shape of rural America, creating larger and larger farms, undermining community structure and businesses. It is driving farmers to make indefensible investment decisions. And it is forcing them to squander the resource base of soil and water that must be kept whole to feed future generations.

Export agriculture has become so vital to the American farmer that the crops from about two of every five acres he harvests now are sold abroad. An astounding 65 percent of the wheat, 55 percent of the soybeans and 35 percent of the coarse grain—corn, sorghum, barley—produced in this country go to buyers overseas.

This is achieved at high cost. With little regard for the future, farmers are mining the soil and water to grow still more grain to add to the surplus that depresses their price. Some of the nation's best topsoil is eroding at shocking rates because of the pressure farmers feel to produce more. The vast underground reservoir known as the Ogallala aquifer, underlying the Great Plains grain belt, is being depleted rapidly to irrigate fields that were meant only for dryland farming. Rich hardwood forests of the lower Mississippi Valley are being cleared systematically for conversion into land for cultivation of crops that add to the glut. At the same time, urban encroachment is eating away some of the most productive farmland, and shrinking the base for future production.

"We can see evidence of a depleting resource base," Senator Roger Jepsen (R. Iowa) said this month, pointing out that soil erosion each year wipes out the productive capability of enough land to feed, clothe and provide lumber for a population the size of San Diego, a city of roughly 1.8 million people. "Preservation of the resource base for present and future . . . production should be paramount. This is basic to national security."

As they deplete the resources, these same farmers go deeper into hock, expanding their debt and their size just to keep pace. They continue to spend billions of dollars annually for unrenewable oil, petrochemical fertilizers and pesticides, seeds and expensive machinery that help them grow grain that sells for less than it costs them to produce. The good times of the mid-1970s, when prices were high and export demand was rising, have become the bad times of the 1980s, with recession and foreign competition leaving farmers high, dry and frightened.

Soil conservationist R. Neil Sampson has put it this way: "Farmers face a constant level of inflation in the cost of the things they purchase, without an offsetting steady rise in the price of the goods they sell. . . . The impact on young farmers, or those trying to overcome cash flow deficits, is devastating."

This litany might be understandable, although hardly acceptable, if farmers in general were getting fat and rich from exports. But precisely the opposite is the case. In the dizzying decade of farm export growth that began in 1970, sales went from $7 billion to more than $40 billion. Yet farm income actually has gone down, farmers' debt-interest costs are about equal to their income and the cost of federal support programs has zoomed to record proportions.

The American farmer, in effect, ends up subsidizing foreign countries, which find it more convenient to buy cheap U.S. food than to invest in their own self-sufficiency. American topsoil and water, used up to grow food, is sent off to places like the Soviet Union, China and Japan in the form of grains that those countries cannot produce in adequate amounts to feed their populations. Contrary to popular notions that American farmers are feeding the world's hungry, the bulk of the exports go to the more developed nations that can afford to pay cash.

U.S. taxpayers further subsidize these same clients by providing cheap irrigation water that adds to the agricultural bounty, and by underwriting the cost of the river transportation system and ports so vital to moving the grain.

Something obviously is very wrong with farming, American-style, and it's generating wide concern among policy makers. The $21 billion price tag of federal farm-support programs this year, in league with the political and social stress of agricultural recession, have ignited a full scale debate over the future of U.S. farm policy.

The issue takes on timeliness with a presidential election next year and with Congress scheduled to write a new four-year farm bill, the basic roadmap for agriculture, in 1985. Farm groups are holding policy forums. Secretary John R. Block this summer held a "summit" to get agribusiness thinking about policy changes.

But with the exception of a few boat-rockers like Rep. James H. Weaver (D-Ore.), former Iowa Gov. Robert Ray and Walter W. Goeppinger, a respected Iowa farmer, most of the politicians, farm organization leaders and agribusiness executives who presume to speak for American farmers are talking and marching in lockstep.

As they have done virtually without exception for 25 years, they urge more exports as the most expedient way of unloading American surpluses. This approach became graven into policy after the Soviets made huge, unexpected grain purchases here in 1972. The Nixon Administration urged farmers to expand their plantings and count on a continuing upward surge of income and exports.

The talk today points in the same direction: more market development, more credit gimmicks for the developing countries, more federal subsidization of exports, more vending of processed food overseas, more punitive measures against competing nations that are crowding American farmers out of their traditional "safe" markets.

For the sake of argument, let's call this bankrupt thinking, literally andd figuratively.

The Carter administration, in its final days, suggested as much in its controversial "Time to Choose" study of the changing structure of U.S. farming. Exports in the 1980s, the report said, "will tend to have high additional costs—both for farmers . . . and in a broader social and economic sense, in raising food prices, intensifying the use of renewable and nonrenewable resouces, and putting further stress on the environment." The entire report was so antithetical to market-oriented Reaganites that Block's USDA has allowed it to go out of print.

Farm exports unquestionably are important to the American economy and the foreign buyers who rely on U.S. farmers. Even with imports of roughly $16 billion worth of food this year, we will be left with an agricultual trade balance of $20 billion. That balance is crucial in the country's ability to pay for its oil and other necessities.

But basic questions remain avoided or unasked. For example, at what point do these export proceeds become diminishing returns? At what cost to the American natural resources base of rich soil and abundant water do we produce food for the world? Why should the American farmer be required to subsidize a world over which he had no control and which dictates his prices?

Congress, for one, and the Reagan administration, for another, have shown little inclination to grapple with questions of that sort in their debating of farm policy. Bright ideas get shot down with regularity. In 1981, for example, Weaver was virtually laughed out of the Agriculture Committee when he resurrected an idea he had floated on a number of occasions.

Arguing that export prices ought to reflect the stress on the natural resource base, Weaver wanted to create an export grain bank that would set an official U.S. price for commodities sold abroad. Free-marketeers were aghast at the idea of intruding in markets that way. Never mind that global agriculture is basically protectionist. Never mind that several other major exporting nations handle their agricultural sales through government boards, or through government-mandated price ceilings and subsidy programs.

Weaver's proposal was defeated in the Agriculture Committee, then voted down as a floor amendment after the big private grain-trading firms put out the word against it. He still picked up 135 votes.

Ray, the former Iowa governor, was so frustrated over the sight of his state's eroding topsoil being sluiced down the Mississippi that he raised the idea of a special tax on export crops to help pay for repair of the land. Ray left office early this year before he could follow up and his idea has gone to pasture.

More interesting, perhaps, is the thinking of Walter Goeppinger, an Iowa farmer who feels that the intense pressure put on the land by export farming may be the ruination of American agriculture. He worries about the ability of U.S. farmers to maintain markets if their best soil washes away.

What makes this important is that Goeppinger long has been a champion of expanded agricultural exports. He was a founder and president of the U.S. Feed Grains Council, which promotes overseas sales and new markets.

"Fence-to-fence, free-market-oriented policy has turned into an economic disaster for the farmer and a soil-loss tragedy for the nation," he wrote recently in the Des Moines Register. He proposed a mandatory idling of 20 percent of all soil used to produce field crops, resting the soil for three years by planting it in grass. In 15 years, all U.S. cropland would have been rested and rebuilt.

"A 20 percent cut in our crop acreage would still produce more than enough for the domestic needs of the United States and leave ample quantities of grain for export," he wrote. "Foreign cash customers should be given first place at our export-buying window and credit customers could come after them in buying any that is left."

If the policy makers would stop and listen, they would understand that Weaver, Ray, Goeppinger and others like them are saying it is time for the United States to approach its most important industry with the same rationale the OPEC nations have applied to their petroleum. They justify their prices by arguing that their oil is a nonrenewable resource. Mine it, sell it, it's gone.

In agriculture, the rationale has tended to be the opposite: a bushel of wheat is a renewable resource. Grow it, sell it, grow it again, sell it again. But that is arguable. If the soil and water base is depleted, as is increasingly the case, the bushel of wheat becomes a nonrenewable resource.

There will be no cheap solutions, or easy answers, to the problems that American agriculture now faces. In seeking them, it will be necessary to consider the interests of a diverse group: consumers at home and abroad, and, above all, less developed nations for which America remains a granary of last resort. These groups have a common interest in seeing that American farmland remains as fruitful in the future as it is now. That hope will be threatened if unbridled exports continue to sell farmers down the river.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the members in closing the debate two recent reports that have commented on the Export Administration Act. One is by the Comptroller General, which says in effect that industry was required to obtain export licenses for many more products than is necessary to protect the national security in fiscal year 1981. Almost 65,000 export applications were processed, but only 1 of every 17 was carefully examined by the Government.

It goes on to make some notations which we have addressed in the committee.

The second report is on "Technology and East-West Trade," which in effect says that trade embargoes in the past have proved ineffective and have inflicted punishment upon our own exporters.

Mr. Chairman, the bill attempts to strike a balance between our national security needs and our economic needs.

I urge my colleagues as we take up the debate during the course of the week to stay with the committee bill.

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of title III (United States Policy Toward South Africa Act of 1983) of the Export Administration Act Amendments Act of 1983, H.R. 3231. I commend Representative SOLARZ for his foresight in insuring that this particular provision is an integral part of this measure.

The Solarz amendment contains language which modifies U.S. relations with South Africa, and most importantly, will make the Sullivan Equal Opportunity Code mandatory. These principles, developed so ably by Rev. Leon Sullivan, are indeed, a major step toward insuring that American businesses be a part of the efforts to promote the rights of black South Africans.

The Sullivan Principles, while not the panacea, have been developed as a result of extensive traveling and examination of the continuing cruelties of the apartheid structure which exists in South Africa. It is reprehensible that some American companies have contributed to the maintenance of this heinous system by operating and thriving within its midst. Dr. Sullivan stands firmly in his belief that the role of the multinational corporations is key in moving toward rectifying the problem of apartheid. Accordingly, his principles are complete with stringent and comprehensive measurement requirements for fair employment and social responsibility practices by these entities.

The volunteer approach to adhering to the Sullivan Principles has rendered the participation of some 137 major corporations. However, this is insufficient and Dr. Sullivan has called for legal enforcement of the principles, undergirded with embargoes, tax penalties, sanctions, loss of government contracts, and other effective means as determined.

Title III of the measure before us is a significant step toward the implementation of the essential program as presented by Dr. Sullivan. This program is a nonviolent effort which calls for actual economic pressure from business groups, religious institutions, universities and other investors using divestment procedures combined with mandatory enforcement of compliance with the Sullivan Code.

It is important to note that title III contains the following enforcements and sanctions. Subtitle I states the principles for endorsement and implementation of fair labor standards for U.S. firms operating in South Africa with more than 20 employees; prescribes penalties for noncompliance; and authorizes the Secretary of State not to implement the provisions of subtitle 1 (labor standards) with respect to a U.S. person if he determines that compliance would harm U.S. national security.

Subtitle 2 prohibits U.S. bank loans to the South African Government, except for loans made for educational, housing and health facilities which are available on a totally nondiscriminatory basis in areas open to all population groups. It also prohibits the importation into the United States of Krugerrands or any other gold coin minted or offered for sale by the South African Government; prescribes penalties for noncompliance; and, authorizes the Secretary of State to implement these provisions.

I would urge strongly that the Sullivan Principles be supported. I believe in the meticulous work of Dr. Sullivan and would submit that the implementation of these principles speaks firmly to the U.S. commitment to equal opportunity for all.●

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California) having assumed the chair, Mr. SEIBERLING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3231) to amend the authorities contained in the Export Administration Act of 1979, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is District of Columbia Day. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS), chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RETIREMENT REFORM ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the Senate bill (S. 1625) and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MICA). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1625

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 145 of the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act, approved November 17, 1979 (93 Stat. 866, 882-884), is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) After January 1, and before March 1, of each year beginning with calendar year 1984 and ending with calendar year 2004, the enrolled actuary engaged pursuant to section 142 shall, with respect to the District of Columbia Police Officers and Fire Fighters' Retirement Fund—

"(A) determine, in accordance with paragraph (2) of this subsection, the disability retirement rate for the preceding calendar year; and

"(B) determine if such disability retirement rate for such preceding calendar year is greater than eight-tenths of a percentage point.

"(2) For the purposes of clause (A) of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the disability retirement rate for the applicable calendar year shall be an amount equal to a fraction, the numerator of which is the number of officers and members of the Metropolitan Police Force and the Fire Department of the District of Columbia who first became officers or members on or before February 14, 1980, and who retired on disability during such applicable year under subsection (f)(1) or (g)(1) of section 12 of the Policemen and Firemen's Retirement and Disability Act (but such numerator shall not include any such officer or member whose retirement is ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction), and the denominator of which is the total number of such officers and members who were on active duty on January 1 of such applicable calendar year.

"(3) The enrolled actuary shall report the determinations (including related documents and information) made under paragraph (1) of this subsection to the Board and to the Comptroller General of the United States not later than March 1 of each year.

"(b)(1) The Board and the Comptroller General shall each transmit a copy of each such report by the enrolled actuary under subsection (a) to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, the Mayor of the District of Columbia, and the Council of the District of Columbia, not later than March 31 of the calendar year in which the report is made, and each shall submit comments on such report.

"(2) The Comptroller General shall include in his comments on each such report transmitted under paragraph (1) of this subsection a statement as to whether or not the determinations made by the enrolled actuary fairly present, in all material respects, the requirements of subsection (a) of this section.

"(2) With respect to each applicable fiscal year, the Comptroller General shall make a determination, as provided for under subsection (c)(1) of this section of the amount, if any, by which the authorization under section 144(a)(1) should be reduced. The results of such determination, together with such other data, information, and comments as the Comptroller General may deem necessary to enable the Congress, and the appropriate committees thereof, to carry out the provisions of subsection (c) of this section, shall be included as a part of his report under paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(c)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, with respect to the fiscal year commencing October 1, 1984, and each fiscal year thereafter through the fiscal year commencing October 1, 2004, the authorization under section 144(a)(1) for each such fiscal year shall be deemed, for purposes of such section, to be reduced in the amount hereafter provided, if the report, submitted by the Comptroller General pursuant to subsection (b) of this section in the calendar year in which such fiscal year commences, states that the disability retirement rate under subsection (a) of this section for the preceding calendar year is greater than eight-tenths of a percentage point. The amount of such reduction shall be 1½ per centum for each whole tenth of a percentage point by which the disability retirement rate is greater than eight-tenths of a percentage point.

"(2) There shall be no reduction pursuant to section 144(a)(1) and paragraph (1) of this subsection for any such fiscal year, if, in computing the disability retirement rate under subsection (a) of this section for the calendar year preceding the calendar year in which such fiscal year commences, the numerator is less than eight.

"(3)(A) If the Board determines, on the basis of substantial facts, that unordinary circumstances or events of catastrophic magnitude, such as a fire or civil disorder, caused or significantly contributed to the number of disability retirements under subsection (g)(1) of section 12 of the Policemen and Firemen's Retirement and Disability Act during a calendar year covered by the report submitted by the Comptroller General pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, it shall submit a detailed statement on such circumstances and events to the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Comptroller General. Such statement shall be submitted on or before July 1 of the calendar year next following the calendar year covered by such report of the Comptroller General. The statement shall contain, among other matters, data on the total number of disability retirements under subsections (f)(1) and (g)(1) of section 12 of such Act for the applicable calendar year, the number of such retirements under subsection (g)(1) of such Act which, in the opinion of the Board, were caused or significantly contributed to by such circumstances or events, and an explanation as to why the Board considers such events or circumstances to be unordinary and of a catastrophic magnitude.

"(B) The Federal Emergency Management Agency shall review the Board's report and provide the Board its assessment within sixty days of receipt of the Board's report, of the scope, nature, involvement, and impact on District of Columbia police officers and firefighters of the events determined by the Board to be of unordinary and of a catastrophic nature. The Agency shall submit copies of its assessment to the Comptroller General, the Board, and the offices and officers set forth in subsection (b) of this section.

"(C)(1) The Comptroller General, on the basis of such reports from the Board and the Federal Emergency Management Agency, shall determine the extent to which such disability retirements which such Agency determined were caused or contributed to by such events and circumstances, caused a reduction in the amount appropriated to the Fund as provided under subsection (c) of this section. The Comptroller General shall report the amount of such reduction so caused to the Board and to the offices and officers set forth in subsection (b)(1) of this section. Such reports shall be submitted on or before December 31 of the calendar year in which he receives such report of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"(2) In addition to the amount authorized to be appropriated to the Fund for any fiscal year under section 144(a)(1), there is authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year commencing October 1, 1984, and each fiscal year thereafter, such sum as may be necessary to pay to the Fund an amount equal to the amount of any reduction, plus interest lost to the Fund because of the reduction, for a fiscal year as reported by the Comptroller General to the offices and officers of the Congress pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, but in no case shall any moneys be appropriated on the basis of the authorization pursuant to this paragraph except to the extent that any such reduction was actually made.".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by this Act shall be considered as having taken effect as of January 1, 1983.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the bill corrects a defect in the 1979 law for retirement of District of Columbia police and firefighters, and for a full explanation of the bill, we will hear a little later in the debate from the gentleman from the District of Columbia (Mr. FAUNTROY) who chairs the Subcommittee on Fiscal Affairs and Health.

With that brief opening statement, Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House passage of Senate bill S. 1625. Unless we follow the Senate's action by the close of this fiscal year, the District of Columbia will suffer an unintended loss of $8.4 million in Federal contribution to the District's retirement fund. It is a loss which was not contemplated when we passed the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act, Public Law 96-122.

The loss will result because of a complex formula known as the "trigger mechanism," which is found in subsection 145(a) of that law. The "trigger mechanism" was designed to provide incentive to the District of Columbia to insure that disability retirements among the police and fire departments employees were legitimate. The Congress passed that subsection because it was felt that the disproportionate number of disability retirees in those departments could be curbed by more effective policing and scrutiny by the D.C. government.

Under the Retirement Reform Act, the annual Federal contribution of $34.1 million would be reduced whenever the cost of the disability retirement benefits for certain employees exceeded an amount calculated by the formula. The formula embodied in subsection 145(a) requires that the District of Columbia Retirement Board annually engage an actuary to determine two things: First, the estimated present value of disability benefits that will be paid to those members of the D.C. Police and Firefighters' Retirement System who were hired before February 15, 1980, and who had not retired as of the first day of the preceding calendar year. Second, the estimated present value of disability benefits that would be paid to the same members if they were subject to the new disability retirement provisions established by the act, which are applicable only to members hired after February 14, 1980.

Following these determinations, the actuary is required to state whether it can be said that the ratio of the first determination to the second determination is greater than 1.02. A ratio greater than 1.02 triggers a reduction in the amount of the Federal contribution. Each payment by the Federal Government, beginning in fiscal year 1984 and ending in fiscal year 2004, is subject to reduction.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that, according to the U.S. General Accounting Office, no matter how diligent the District is in policing disability retirements, the "trigger mechanism" will be exceeded. Even in a year when there were no disability retirements, the 1.02 ratio was exceeded, because it is based upon expected future disabilities.

Senate bill 1625 corrects this inequity by amending section 145 of the Retirement Reform Act and providing that the Federal contribution will be reduced only when the number of disability retirees reaches a certain fixed percentage of the labor force. Under current strength, the number would be 42, a number which, if recent trends hold, is not likely to be reached.

Mr. Speaker, S. 1625 makes certain other changes aimed at buttressing the spirit of its main provisions, such as adjusting the percentage of allowable disability retirees in the event of a "catastrophic" event. It further provides that if less than a fixed number of retirements covered by the amendment is granted in any one calendar year, no reduction in the Federal contribution will occur. In addition, it provides for a simplified formula for determining the reduction in the Federal contribution, should a reduction be warranted.

Under the changes embodied in S. 1625, excessive disability rates would continue to be penalized; however, reasonable rates achieved by the District, as in the past 3 years, would not set off the "trigger mechanism." I urge the House to join the Senate in support of this critical measure. Thank you.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, today, we are considering S. 1625, a bill to refine the trigger mechanism for funding of the District of Columbia retirement program for police and firefighters. This bill has already passed overwhelmingly in the other body and is strongly supported by all members of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the House.

This bill is a technical correction of a measure originally approved in the 96th Congress. At that time, the District of Columbia police and firefighters had a disability retirement rate of more than 95 percent. The Congress realized that that rate could not be valid and that it was costing the Federal Government, which funded the retirement program, a great deal of money. The trigger mechanism was instituted to require the government of the District of Columbia to pay a larger portion of its retirement program if disability retirements exceeded a set percentage.

Since 1980, the rate of disability retirements has decreased sharply. The trigger has worked. Now, we are faced with an unforeseen problem with the trigger as it was originally written. If the disability retirement rate drops too low, then the District of Columbia is penalized just as it is if the rate is too high. This unintended catch-22 is what we are correcting today.

This bill was recommended by the General Accounting Office, has been endorsed by the District of Columbia, the police and firefighters associations and the Retirement Board of the District of Columbia, and has been approved by the other body. I join with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle on the Committee on the District of Columbia in urging a vote in favor of this necessary technical amendment to the retirement program of the District of Columbia.

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to provide some historical background on this issue, and in so doing, dispel any notion that this legislation would somehow erode the improvements made in the last few years in the administration of disability retirements of District of Columbia police officers and firefighters.

In the late 1960's and through most of the 1970's the number of D.C. police officers and firefighters retiring on disability was nothing short of an absolute disgrace. The system was plagued with abuse, and there was a public outcry for change. Congress, primarily through the Appropriations Committees, demanded effective administration of the retirement program with the very real threat that, absent dramatic changes, Federal funding would be withheld.

By the end of the 1970's, Congress also realized that there was an even greater problem with the District of Columbia retirement system in that it was seriously underfunded. If nothing were done to correct the potential shortfall, the city would eventually be faced with paying more in retirement benefits each year than its payroll for active employees. It was recognized that part of the underfunding problem was from pre-home-rule days, and since Congress had complete control over the city during that period, part of the blame could clearly be laid at the feet of Congress.

Legislation, which became Public Law 96-122, was introduced to address this problem. It provided for a cooperative effort between the city and Congress to eliminate the underfunding over a period of 25 years. Although by that time, the city had demonstrated some improvement in the administration of disability retirements, there still appeared to be an overly liberal application of the rules and procedures for granting full or partial disability. Accordingly, at the insistence of the conferees from the other body, Public Law 96-122 included a formula which, in a nutshell, provided for a reduction in the annual Federal contribution to the retirement funds for police and firefighters if disability retirements were excessive. The House conferees proposed several alternative mechanisms, which may or may not have worked better than what was finally agreed upon. In addition, there was some question as to whether or not the formula decided upon would be effective. In any event, the conferees from the other body agreed, and the conference report so stated, that if the mechanism proved unworkable or did not function as intended, changes would be proposed.

Mr. Speaker, calendar year 1983 was the first year in which this formula came into play. As required by Public Law 96-122, the D.C. Retirement Board and its enrolled actuary filed a report with the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. That report indicates that after applying the formula, a reduction in the Federal contribution is mandated. It also points out that the formula is flawed, and will likely result in a penalty for a year in which there is only one disability retirement. The Comptroller General of the United States notes that under the existing formula, a reduction in the Federal contribution would be likely even if there were no disability retirements. The report goes on to suggest that the city has significantly reduced the number of disability retirements, consistent with congressional intent, and that a modified formula would clearly be in order. The report to which I am referring arrived in March 1983, and was the genesis for the bill currently under consideration.

I would suggest to my colleagues that the new formula embodied in S. 1625 is the reasonable and proper solution to this dilemma. We ought not to penalize the city when the record shows that compliance with the intent of Congress has been achieved. At the same time, we ought not invite a return to the previous abuse by eliminating any penalty altogether.

The specifics of the new mechanism contained in S. 1625 have already been explained. The bill has the support and agreement of the Comptroller General of the United States, the District of Columbia Retirement Board, and executive branch of the local government.

There is only one other item which should be mentioned. The existing law stipulates that a calculation be made based on the existing flawed formula. That has been done, and the result is the mandating of a reduction of $8.04 million in the next Federal contribution to be made to the retirement funds. It is a reduction which is unfair since the city has undeniably complied with the intent of Congress. But it is a reduction which will occur if this bill is not approved and signed by the President before October 1, 1983.

I urge the support of my colleagues in correcting this inequity.●

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support for the bill on the House floor today, S. 1625, which would revise the formula for disability retirements of D.C. Police and Firefighters.

This legislation would change the "trigger mechanism," which determines whether the annual Federal payment to the D.C. Police and Fire Retirement Fund shall be reduced. When Congress passed the D.C. Retirement Reform Act in 1979, annual Federal contributions were authorized to address the prehome rule pension liability, and a trigger mechanism was included to reduce this Federal contribution if disability retirements were abused. At that time, it was noted by Members of Congress that future changes would be suggested if the formula was unworkable. The bill before us addresses those needed changes to the formula.

Under current calculations, the city could be penalized in a year in which there were no disability retirements. Because current law provides for a calculation to be made, this year the city will lose $8.4 million of the fiscal year 1984 Federal contribution if S. 1625 is not passed. However, under the legislation before us, the trigger mechanism would still be intact and a penalty would be incurred if abuses were to exist.

I would like to note that the General Accounting Office, the D.C. Retirement Board, and all members of the House District of Columbia Committee are supporting passage of this legislation. I urge my colleagues to do the same.●

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the Senate bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

A TRIBUTE TO AN OUTSTANDING LEGISLATOR: DAVID E. CLARENBACH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, whoever said that youth was wasted on the young never met Wisconsin State Representative David E. Clarenbach. Next month David will celebrate his 30th birthday. He will also observe his 12th year as an elected public official and his 10th year in the Wisconsin State Legislature.

David's remarkable career is a testament to the ability of young people, if they care, to have a meaningful impact on public policy. Elected to the Dane County Board of Supervisors at the age of 18, he spent 2 years on the county board and then was elected to the Madison City Council in 1974. That same year he ran for the Wisconsin State Assembly and began an illustrious career which already spans 10 years and which is clearly only the beginning.

During his service in the assembly, David has chaired two standing committees—Goverment Operations in 1981 and the Joint Survey Committee on Tax Exemptions in 1979. This year he was elected speaker pro tem of the assembly.

He also initiated and chaired two legislative council special committees, both of which addressed key issues and resulted in the introduction and passage of legislation: the Study Committee on the Privacy of Personal Records and the Study Committee on Economic Development. The Economic Development Committee has resulted in the establishment for the first time of permanent committees in both the assembly and senate to address this issue.

David is a legislator in the most progressive Wisconsin tradition. Invariably ahead of his time, he has introduced and worked for numerous legislative initiatives that many thought were hopeless causes when they were first offered. Today, he can look back on key accomplishments that resulted from his vision and his persistence: regulation of the use of lie detectors, a moratorium on nuclear powerplant construction, the mandate of emergency plans for nuclear powerplant accidents, the end of criminal sanctions for private consensual sexual activity, and the Nation's first statewide prohibition on discrimination based on sexual orientation.

David has been honored many times with awards for his achievements, most recently by the Wisconsin Women's Political Caucus, the Wisconsin Civil Liberties Union, the Wisconsin State Employees Union, and Environmental Decade. He has also been selected as one of the "Outstanding Young Men in America."

This would be an enviable career for an individual who had served decades in public office and was looking forward to retirement. Yet, those of us who know David and have worked with him during his years in public office know that there are vistas yet to be explored and still further imprints to be left on history.

I join his many friends in congratulating David Clarenbach for a truly remarkable 10 years and wish him continued success as he enters his second decade in the State legislature.●

IMF-EXIM PROPOSALS HARMFUL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PATMAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the attached lucid testimony that was given before the House Appropriations Committee Subcommittee on Foreign Operations expresses the concern of the distinguished professor of economics and former Under Secretary of Treasury in the Reagan administration, Paul Craig Roberts.

His conern was about the proposed $8.4 billion quota increase for the International Monetary Fund currently being considered by Congress.

On a related matter, last Friday the Senate passed S. 869, Export-Import Bank Amendments of 1983 that included a section specifically authorizing the Eximbank to establish guarantees of $2 billion in support of export transactions to Brazil and Mexico.

However, the Senate bill limits the authority to 18 months duration and clarifies the necessity of notifying Congress before any such financial guarantee of loans would be granted in the future.

Since the House has not yet acted on the proposed guarantee of $2 billion, and since my House Resolution 311 to delay implementation of the proposed guarantees until Congress has a chance to act has not yet had hearings, I would like the Members to thoughtfully consider the points Dr. Roberts raises in relation to the IMF quota increase as his points also apply to the proposed guarantees of the Eximbank should any loans default.

Specifically, Dr. Roberts warned that:

The IMF is undertaking the lead in an effort to protect the existing international debt situation.

There is a tendency for debtors to cease viewing their debts as contractual obligations and to begin seeing them as something subject to politics and international diplomacy.

It is certainly possible that additional lending to foreign governments could have the effect of reducing the progress of their economies, thereby jeopardizing the repayment of the capital that has already been lent to them.

Both the IMF and Eximbank authorizations where part of H.R. 2957 that became S. 695 amended passed in lieu, and has now been returned to the Senate. The Senate passed S. 869 Exim amendments in a separate bill last Friday that will be sent to the House. I urge my colleagues to vote against these bills when they come before the House for all the reasons Dr. Roberts explains.

TESTIMONY OF PAUL CRAIG ROBERTS

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as you know I have reservations about the $8.4 billion quota increase for the International Monetary Fund that is currently being considered by the Congress. My reservations are due to the reasoning that lies behind this particular quota increase, and my reservations do not reflect any animosity on my part toward the IMF, the New York banks, the Third World, or the Reagan Administration. Indeed, I have reservations about this quota increase because I believe its implications are harmful to the interests of all four.

Consider first the IMF. Its participation in a worldwide bailout of debtors and creditors might reflect an admirable spirit of concern, but it is also a further move away from the IMF's traditional function. Whatever terms we use to describe it, the IMF is undertaking the lead in an effort to protect the existing international debt situation. Since it was not envisaged as an international lender of last resort, it might be risking its reputation in playing a role that exceeds its resources.

The IMF is also risking its authority: The debt problem is so large that debtor nations may combine together to resist the conditions that the IMF imposes on the policies of troubled debtors in order to right their economies. In order to secure the agreements that protect the debt situation, the IMF is having to weaken the conditionality that it imposes. Larger responsibilities and weaker authority do not bode well for the future success of the IMF, but they do pose the possibility that the IMF will be turned into an aid-giving agency.

Consider the effects on the debtor countries. For many of them, the IMF-led rescue packages are resulting in a buildup of their debts, because they are being lent more money to pay interest. If their problem is an inability to service their existing debt burden, then piling debt upon debt worsens, rather than solves, their problem.

More important is the change in the psychology of the debtor nations—the change in their attitude toward their debts—that occurs when the IMF, the U.S. government, and other governmental entities interject themselves in the relationship between debtors and their banking creditors. There is a tendency for debtors to cease viewing their debts as contractural obligations and to begin seeing them as something subject to politics and international diplomacy. The political dynamics set them on a course of working to turn loans into wealth transfers. Regardless of their own integrity, debtor governments can find themselves set on this course by pressure from their political opposition calling for debt repudiation. Such calls rise in pitch when the IMF's involvement results in the application of austere economic policies to the economies of the debtor nations. It can be potent politics for an opposition to claim that a sitting government is throwing its people out of work in order to pay back U.S. banks. Some the debtors are already politically unstable and antagonistic toward the U.S.

Consider the effects on the banks. Once debts are politicized through the intervention of third parties and psychological changes occur in the attitude of some debtors toward their debts, banks face a less promising environment for recovering principal and interest. The long-run effect of this attitude could be to put the banks' capital at greater risk.

Consider the effects on the U.S. government which is trying to deal with its own debt problems and to reduce the pressure of its own presence in the financial markets. The U.S.'s $8.4 billion IMF quota subscription will have to be financed by Treasury borrowing in the financial markets. Furthermore, the additional lending by U.S. banks that is part of the IMF loan packages means less credit remains at home with which to finance the debt of the U.S. government, municipalities and private business. There are also domestic political costs involved if U.S. voters conclude that their government puts foreigners and banks ahead of other uses of U.S. resources.

More generally, if debtor nations cannot generate the foreign exchange earnings to pay principal and interest after so much political prestige is poured into the refunding packages, pressures will mount to seek recourse in the resurgence of world inflation. Inflation would depreciate the real value of the debts and generate rising oil and commodity prices that would help some debtors service their debts. But it could also bring to a halt the real economic growth that is the true long-run solution.

Considering the risks inherent in the bailout approach to the debt problem, I would prefer to avoid this approach if possible. Since panic has prevented much serious thought from being given to the matter, it is hard to know for sure if there is a safer alternative. One alternative consists of debtors and creditors sitting down together and rescheduling the debts. There is no a priori reason for rescheduling to require new loan commitments by the IMF; indeed, it would be preferable for debtors to avoid adding to their debt burdens. Many people believe that the IMF's presence facilitates the rescheduling and that additional lending is a small price to pay. However, there was no IMF presence in the rescheduling of the Polish and East German debt, and the process is proceeding without the involvement of IMF.

Regardless of the IMF's presence and whether new loan commitments are involved, debt rescheduling is already providing the primary solution to the debt problem. I know of no reason that rescheduling cannot solve the entire problem, particularly in conjunction with policies of economic growth in the OECD countries. The New York Times reported on August 27, 1983, that Mexico and its commercial bank creditors signed an agreement to stretch out repayment of $11.4 billion of debt coming due between August 1982 and December 1984. The new terms allow Mexico a four-year grace period on its principal repayments followed by an eight-year repayment period, thus stretching out two years of debt repayments over twelve. Such a rescheduling does more to reduce Mexico's immediate debt servicing burden than can be achieved by granting new loans by the IMF.

Mr. Chairman, liquidity problems are not the only problem in the world debt picture. Unfortunately, most international lending has been to governments and government-sponsored agencies. Lending agencies key their loans to the development plans of governments, and private banks feel more secure placing their loans with foreign governments than with private businesses in foreign countries. In a speech last month on August 25, Undersecretary of Commerce Lionel Olmer pointed out that this amounts to "red-lining" the private sector in developing countries, and he condemned the practice as a major impediment to their economic growth. It is certainly possible that additional lending to foreign governments could have the effect of reducing the progress of their economies, thereby jeopardizing the repayment of the capital that has already been lent to them.

There is little doubt that secure private property rights are the foundation of successful economic development. The foreign exchange restrictions that have accompanied the efforts of countries like Mexico to put their homes in order are an example of the ways in which private property rights are being eroded in those lands that most need them. Now then a private Mexican firm exports goods, the Mexican government confiscates its hard currency earnings and pays the firm with Mexican pesos. If the firm needs hard currencies for imports necessary to its business, it must compete for an allocation against government enterprises that are more likely to be favored by the government that makes the allocation. International lending and the pressures on debtor governments to get their hands on hard currencies seem to have further stacked the cards against private enterprise in many countries. No amount of government-to-government grants and loans can make up for the neglect of the private sector.

Recently Keith Marsden of the World Bank published a study of twenty countries showing that those with lower taxes experienced the highest economics growth. Lower taxes imply a smaller government sector. This study's conclusion should be kept in mind not just when we debate our own future policies, but also when we consider that the conditions imposed by the IMF on debtor countries often include higher taxes, thereby reducing the economic growth that is the ultimate source of loan repayment.●

TOWARD REASON AND UNITY IN EAST-WEST TRADE POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. BONKER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, today's news contains a graphic example of how overzealous action by the Defense Department to protect national security by unilaterally restricting trade can actually backfire and result in weakened controls. This matter is particularly worthy of note since we will be taking up extension and amendments of the Export Administration Act this week. That act provides the authority to the executive branch to restrict export trade for national security, foreign policy, and other reasons.

I refer of course, to the resignation of the State Department's most senior expert on East-West trade, William A. Root. Mr. Root has guided the implementation of East-West trade policy through several administrations. Better than anyone else in the Government he knows the practical possibilities and limitations that relate to export controls in a world in which the United States is no longer the exclusive source of advanced technologies that can have military applications if obtained by potential adversaries. It is a shame to lose a knowledgeable and respected expert because of lack of clear policy by the administration on export control policy.

The Defense Department hard-liners who want to take over export control policy, vested by law jointly in the Commerce, State, and Defense Departments, only confuse U.S. policy.

Mr. Speaker, the reason for Mr. Root's resignation is that the Defense Department wants to scrap Cocom—the organization in which we coordinate export controls with our European and Japanese allies—at the same time that the President has called for "redoubled efforts with our allies to end the flow of military and strategic items to the Soviet Union." Mr. Speaker, the bill that the House will act on later this week is a responsible approach and one that deserves support in the House. Let us pass that bill and help the President regain control over his own Defense Department.

Mr. Root's resignation statement follows:

SEPTEMBER 24, 1983.

OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT AND TO THE CONGRESS

The arrogance of the United States Government is rapidly eroding the effectiveness of controls on the export of strategic equipment and technology. Those who proclaim the loudest the need to strengthen these controls are doing the most to weaken them.

In his television speech following the Korean Airlines 007 incident, the President stressed the need to "redouble our efforts with our Allies to end the flow of military and strategic items to the Soviet Union." Since that time we have, instead, been redoubling our efforts to convey to our Allies that their views do not count, that we know best, and that they had better shape up. This is no way to obtain cooperation. It most certainly does not constitute efforts "with" our Allies.

Corrective action is needed immediately. We have set a time bomb in COCOM, the Coordinating Committee where NATO nations and Japan coordinate such controls. It is set to go off on October 17.

The most significant COCOM control in terms of number of cases reviewed is the computer item. The COCOM computer definition is obsolete, having been last revised on the basis of 1974 proposals. COCOM has been unable to reach agreement on a revised definition during the past five years of negotiations because of U.S. insistence that the Allies simply accept U.S. proposals. The Allies have been receptive to a wide range of U.S. strengthening proposals, for both hardware and software. But they have also submitted many constructive proposals of their own which would make the controls more effective.

During many months of negotiations over the past year a composite draft reflecting everyone's views was hammered out. COCOM accepted the U.S. proposal that a session to reach final decisions on differences not yet resolved begin on October 17. The United States is not prepared to negotiate at that session.

On September 14, on the eve of the September 15 deadline for submission of comments on the composite draft, Defense advised State and Commerce of its views that (1) COCOM was an inadequate forum to negotiate the important computer item; (2) the United States should not deviate from its pre-composite draft proposals at the October meeting; and (3) the real negotiations should take place later in an unspecified forum at which a senior Defense official would represent the United States.

The clear (though unstated) Defense objectives are to demonstrate that (a) COCOM as it is now constituted is ineffective and should be replaced by a military committee and (b) Defense should replace State as the agency responsible to conduct the negotiations. Reasonable people can differ on these jurisdictional questions. But we have no alternative but to proceed on the basis of the existing COCOM framework and the existing statutory authorization for State to conduct negotiations, until one or both are changed.

If the United States cannot get its act together, our Allies will conclude that they must use their national discretion to decide what to license and what not to license. Indeed, this has already happened in several important cases as a result of frustrations from the already protracted negotiations. The fundamental objective of COCOM is to avoid diverse actions taken at national discretion by coordinating the national export control decisions of the member governments.

On October 17, there will be a major, justified explosion of Allied resentment of U.S. contempt for the COCOM process.

U.S. arrogance stems directly from the kind of thinking which led to Section 10(g) of the Export Administration Act. This section requires the President to report to the Congress any U.S. export control case for which the recommendation of the Defense Department is not followed. Although it does not literally apply to differences between State and Defense on COCOM negotiations, a spin-off effect has eliminated the kind of cooperation between those two Departments which is essential for such negotiations.

The President has never over-ruled Defense on an export control case and probably never will as long as Section 10(g) is on the books. The required report to the Congress would indicate that the Commander-in-Chief was not master in his own house. Defense personnel know that their views have prevailed on several occasions when it was generally believed that the President held different views. Accordingly, they see no reason to listen to the views of other agencies or of other governments. They are no doubt sincere in believing that they are thereby protecting the nation's security. However, the end-result is a situation in which it is impossible to conduct negotiations with our Allies. Effective controls depend upon negotiations, because the United States is not a unique supplier of most strategic items.

The issue is whether to have ineffective unilateral controls (the result of rigid adherence to U.S. proposals) or effective multilateral controls (which can be achieved through cooperative negotiations).

Our perverse efforts have been the strategically less significant oil and gas area as well as in the computer area. Much attention has been given recently to recommendations to put our oil and gas proposals to COCOM under unilateral security controls and deny a pending $40 million case for submersible pumps. The U.S. oil and gas proposals now before COCOM are the subject to on-going negotiations. The Allies have been extraordinarily cooperative in helping to find well-justified and clearly defined oil and gas related items which should be put under multilateral control. But it is apparent that substantial revision in our original proposals will be necessary to further our common objective at the next scheduled meeting on this subject in January. Any stiffening of our unilateral licensing policy based on the original proposals would greatly damage the cooperative atmosphere. This atmosphere was re-established with much difficulty after the 1982 pipeline controls controversy. Without it there can be no strengthening of multilateral controls in this area.

What should be done? The Administration should (1) negotiate the computer item on October 17 on the basis of the composite draft and (2) revise the U.S. oil and gas proposals to take into account the constructive suggestions of our Allies. The Congress should repeal Section 10(g) of the Export Administration Act when renewing this Act (which expires on September 30).

Sincerely,

WILLIAM A. ROOT,
Director, Office of East West Trade, Department of State.

WILSON BRIDGE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MICA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take just a moment of editorial license here today to commend an individual or group that I do not personally know. That is the corporation and those who work on the Wilson Bridge here in the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia area.

It appears that this is the only federally owned bridge in this area, the only federally owned public works project that I know of in recent years that has been completed, not only on schedule, but 3 months ahead of schedule. As a Floridian who has had to commute this distance to the Capitol from home while the House is in session, I have had the opportunity to look at this construction project, to look at the innovative ways in which the bridge has been mended and repaired, keeping the traffic flowing on a daily basis, closing only at night for removal of sections of the bridge to allow traffic to proceed. And I think it has just been an act that is commendable, and we should take notice here in the Congress that someone, somewhere in this great bureaucracy, has found a corporation that allows the construction of a bridge to be completed, not only on schedule, but ahead of schedule. And I commend whoever it is who owns that corporation, and those in our Government who found this new procedure. And I might suggest that we might look at that in bridges from Florida to Maine and from the District of Columbia to San Francisco, because every other project I have seen has been far beyond schedule.

TRIBUTE TO GEN. EDWARD C. MEYER

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Gen. Edward C. "Shy" Meyer who recently retired as Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army.

Though one of the youngest officers to head the Army, General Meyer brought the full panoply of necessary qualifications to the top soldier's job. After graduating from West Point in 1951 he served with distinction in Korea, and, later, twice in Vietnam. His decorations from those campaigns include two Silver and two Bronze Stars, the Distinguished Flying Cross, 34 Air Medals, and the Purple Heart.

General Meyer's qualifications equipped him to assess the condition of the Army soon after he became Chief of Staff. This Nation owes him its thanks for his courageous, forthright, and timely warning that the Army was in danger of becoming "hollow." As events subsequently proved, Shy Meyer was precisely the right man to cure the ills he diagnosed.

Surely that is General Meyer's greatest distinction. He restored the morale and combat effectiveness of an Army still demoralized from the Vietnam experience and depleted from long years of neglect. The list of his initiatives and accomplishments in placing the Army on the right track includes the following:

Returning Active Army units that were below strength when he became Chief of Staff in 1979 to their full authorization.

Halting the movement toward an "all heavy" force by introducing more light, maneuverable units. Integration of light and heavy forces has improved overall capabilities.

Improving the quality of the Army across the board. His emphasis on excellence included equipment, training, military doctrine, and the way of life provided for soldiers. General Meyer channeled scarce financial resources to the development and procurement of modern equipment. He increased the quality of personnel recruited into the Army and initiated measures designed to make Army life attractive enough to retain highly motivated, trained, and skilled soldiers.

Championing the "Total Army" concept which includes the ongoing effort to increase National Guard and Army Reserve readiness.

Improving the professionalism, training, and education of the noncommissioned officer corps.

Developing and sponsoring the high technology test bed project to provide a mechanism to create and test new doctrine and equipment.

Expanding the use of the national training center which is designed to create a realistic military training environment. The national training center is now the most modern military training center in the free world.

Initiating the new regimental system to increase soldier esprit, stability of assignments, and cohesion of units.

Mr. Speaker, a man's worth can be measured by the value of the objectives he pursues. And a man's contributions can be gaged by his success in achieving those objectives. By these criteria Gen. Edward C. Meyer has few peers among the many distinguished officers who have led our Army throughout our history as a nation.

Mr. Speaker, I know I speak for members of the Committee on Armed Services, as well as the entire House of Representatives, in thanking General Meyer for his outstanding service and wishing him good fortune in the coming years.

U.S.S. "HYMAN G. RICKOVER," SSN 709

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, a greatly deserved honor was bestowed on Adm. Hyman Rickover on August 27, 1983. On that day the nuclear attack submarine, U.S.S. Hyman G. Rickover, was christened and launched. Of course, no one more deserves to be honored for our outstanding nuclear submarine program than Admiral Rickover.

The occasion also provided an opportunity to honor another very special person. This person is Mrs. Eleanore B. Rickover, the admiral's wife, who christened the ship. This most gratious lady has also served our Nation in the Navy Marine Corps. Admiral Rickover is indeed fortunate to have such an outstanding person as his mate and partner in his life and work. I believe that Eleanor's observations on the occasion of the christening and launching ceremony are so significant and tell so much about her sensitive and charitable nature that I would like to bring them to the attention of all of my colleagues. Accordingly, I would like to include her recorded remarks at the conclusion of my statement.

I would also like to include Admiral Rickover's comments at the close of my remarks. His salute to the commitment of individuals who apply their personal efforts for the good of society and his comments concerning the importance of organizations dealing honestly and fairly with our Government contain important principles which must be followed.

At this point I include the following:

REMARKS BY ELEONORE B. RICKOVER AT THE LUNCHEON IN HER HONOR FOLLOWING THE LAUNCHING OF THE U.S.S. "HYMAN G. RICKOVER" (SSN 709)

Thank you very much! That's quite a feat—to bring home all these gifts, and it isn't even Christmas.

The day is so filled with emotion that it is difficult to say just "Thank you." It does not seem enough. However, I feel I have the greatest prize there is—and that is—my husband.

When I told my husband I wanted to say a few words, a few remarks, not a speech, he seemed quite concerned. He said, "You are not going to talk about me?" I said, "I'm not going to tell you." Even last night he kept asking, "What is the theme of your talk?" "You will just have to wait," was my answer.

I want you to know my "laid back" husband, who doesn't get excited, didn't sleep too well last night, as I also did not. We were both a little excited, and it was well worth it, because this has been a tremendous experience for me, and I think for him too, to see all the people who mean so much to him.

I want to thank the many people here who made this day such a special one—starting with Mr. Lewis, Mr. Tovar, Mr. Miller, Capt. Fox, and expecially Adm. Watkins, for the fine remarks he made.

When I told my husband I like to speak without any notes, he said, "You'd better have some." So I have some.

I am deeply honored and proud to have christened the HYMAN G. RICKOVER today. I am equally proud to have served in the United States Navy Nurse Corps. But most of all, I am proud of my husband and proud to be his wife. And you know, the reason I submitted an out-of-date picture was because of the way I feel about the Navy. Even though it was nine years old, I didn't think you'd care.

The night before we were married, my husband hand-carried a note to me from the Secretary of the Navy, now Senator Warner. I planned to read it to you, but I must have dropped it, so I will just have to ad-lib it.

This is what he wrote: To a Navy Bride: He said I was going to take on this awesome responsibility, because my husband was an institution. But I deserved to be happy and should not let that deter any of my happiness, because I had managed to win the highest selection there was in the Navy selection process. And I think you know what he was saying.

Had I thought of him as an institution, I probably would not have said, "yes." He is a very warm, kind, and human person.

I also thought about what I would say. The reason I could think about it was that I was here a couple of times before. I was on the platform and remembered how the submarine slid into the water while the band played "Anchors Aweigh." I was in tears then.

Today, the emotion is even more so, because how many people are privileged to break a bottle of champagne and utter their husband's name? What I recalled most when this happened was something that some of you will know. In the early days my husband gave a small plaque to the prospective commanding officers of nuclear ships. Inscribed on it was an anonymous prayer of the Breton fisherman. It reads:

"O God, Thy Sea is so Great
"And my Boat is so Small.

Standing alongside that majestic ship with her magnificent crew, and then seeing her slide into the water, one cannot help but think how one's perspective changes and reality sets in. The ship does diminish.

This prayer became even more vivid to me while I was stationed on Guam and had the opportunity to go aboard the submarine Kmehameha for a day and even submerge to a thousand feet. That was something for a female. Of course, I was in the Navy. What I remember most of all was having to take a tug out to the ship and board her through a tiny opening (the hatch). Once again, the boat looked so small and the sea so great!

Today, I want to do one thing that may seem strange to some of the men here in uniform. But I am not denigrating anything they stand for, because I wore the uniform and had a very exciting life—it was not always in the emergency room, either. I want to take this opportunity to extend the honor accorded me and to Salute the Navy Wife! As I do so, I think about how important she is because she makes it possible for her husband to have the best of both worlds. And it may be they do not think about that too often. In my salute, I also want to include the first Mrs. Rickover, who deserved this honor far more than I do.

In conclusion, I repeat what I said at the christening. I deviated a little, but I also said the traditional words:

In the name of the United States, I christen thee, Hyman G. Rickover. May God bless her and all who sail in her.

I added a few words of my own and borrowed the last line from one of Milton's sonnets. I said:

May God bless their families and loved ones, for "they also serve who only stand and wait."

Thank you.

REMARKS BY ADM. H. G. RICKOVER AT THE LAUNCHING OF THE U.S.S. "H. G. RICKOVER"

At ship launchings it is customary to say fine things about the sponsor; who is then surprised to learn how unusual a person she really is.

But in the case of my wife, Eleonore, there is nothing superfluous one could say. She is living truth that a fine and beautiful woman can have the capacity and stamina to tolerate one such as me.

I will now say a few words that should have been said many years ago.

We have become accustomed to giving praise to organizations and not to people.

Consider today's events: The speakers always give credit to the corporation—in this case General Dynamics.

But I will tell the real story why Electric Boat is the leading submarine builder in the United States.

The design and building of the Nautilus prototype in Idaho had proceeded to the point where I needed a submarine shipyard to become involved, I thought it would be a good idea for the Portsmouth, N.H., Naval Shipyard, which had designed and built many submarines during World War II, to build the ship.

So I visited the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, and asked the shipyard commander if he would be willing to provide the naval architects and engineers needed for designing and building the land-based atomic energy prototype plant in Idaho. In this way his yard would have a decisive advantage when the time came for the actual construction of the submarine. He refused, saying he did not have the manpower or the Navy funds necessary for such an undertaking.

I replied I would see to it that he would have all the necessary manpower and funds. These would be provided by the Atomic Energy Commission not the Navy. But he was adamant.

After talking with the "reluctant dragon," I reached across his desk and used his telephone. While the shipyard commander listened, I called Mr. O. P. Robinson, the manager of Electric Boat, and asked if he could construct the world's first atomic submarine. He immediately responded, "yes."

I met with him that evening and we worked out the relationship for this joint venture. Mr. Robinson demonstrated an attitude of hearty cooperation and not of dignified acquiescence—as has been the experience at the beginning of some honeymoons.

This relationship between the Navy and General Dynamics continued to be outstanding even after it was taken over by the General Dynamics Corp.—except for one recent set of events: The local manager attempted to impose his will on the U.S. Navy. But, that official is no longer at Electric Boat.

I trust that the lesson from this event will be long remembered and will remain deeply imbedded in the brains of General Dynamics officials in St. Louis.

Fair and honest dealing with the U.S. Government is the best policy for the individual citizen, as is the fulfillment of legal obligations on the part of corporations doing business with the U.S. Government.

I believe that this relationship will continue to be mutually beneficial from now on if Electric Boat acts as a responsible supplier and not as a contractor trying to dominate the customer.

In large corporations it is customary to assign credit to the senior officials and blame to the lower ranks when something goes wrong

In the case of the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, due to the lack of vision and courage by the shipyard's naval management, Electric Boat became the leading submarine yard in the United States.

Bear in mind, all effort in the world is done by and through people, not organizations. So, whenever you read the full-page shipbuilders advertisements, just remember how the job really got done. Also remember that the actions of some shipyard officials have not been in the best interests of the customer of even of their own yard.●

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 1010

By Mr. SHUSTER:

Amendments to the amendment in the nature of a substitute (text of H.R. 3857).

—Page 3, line 7, strike out "is" and insert in lieu thereof "may be".

—Page 14, strike out line 13 and all that follows through line 20 on page 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Any certificated transporter of coal by pipeline desiring to acquire a right-of-way across lands belonging to a common carrier engaged in the interstate transportation of coal may apply to the Commission for an order requiring use of the common carrier's lands for a coal pipeline right-of-way. The Commission may, by order, require the use of the common carrier's rights-of-way or facilities and shall fix just and reasonable compensation therefor.

"(b) In determining whether to issue such an order, the Commission shall take into account the willingness of the respective parties to negotiate the terms and conditions for a grant of the right-of-way and the need for the right-of-way.".

—Page 14, strike out line 13 and all that follows through line 16 on page 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 9. (a)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, any person holding a certificate under section 10 of this Act may apply to the Commission for approval of the acquisition of such person of a right-of-way for the construction, operation, maintenance, or extension of a pipeline over, under, upon, or through any private lands owned by a common carrier providing transportation subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission under subchapter I of chapter 105 of title 49, United States Code.

"(2) The Commission shall approve an application under this subsection if the Commission determines that—

"(A) the construction and operation of the coal pipeline does not unreasonably interfere with operations of the common carrier whose property would be crossed;

"(B) the applicant agrees to pay the common carrier for the right-of-way provided;

"(C) the proposed acquisition is in the public interest; and

"(D) the terms of the proposed acquisition (including the amount of payment) are just and reasonable.

"(3) If the carriers are unable to agree on the terms of the proposed acquisition (including the amount of payment), the Commission shall establish just and reasonable terms. In addition, if the Commission finds that the terms agreed upon by the carriers are not just and reasonable, it may condition its approval of the application upon such modification of such terms as it considers necessary and appropriate.".

—Page 14, lines 17 and 18, strike out "necessary for construction, operation, and maintenance of such pipeline or extension" and insert in lieu thereof "owned by any common carrier engaged in the interstate transportation of coal".

"(f) The power granted in subsection (a) of this section may be exercised to acquire a property interest greater than that needed to effect a crossing, but in no event greater than 200 feet.".

"(f) No right-of-way may be acquired through exercise of the power of eminent domain under this section if such right-of-way is over, under, upon, or through any private lands under one ownership consisting of 1,000 contiguous acres or more.".

"(l) No certificate shall be issued under this section for a coal pipeline for which water would be taken from any aquifer or other body of groundwater which underlies more than one State unless—

"(1) there is in effect an interstate compact between the affected States which governs such sale or transfer; or

"(2) all the affected States consent to such sale or transfer.".

"(1) With respect to each certificate issued under this section, the Commission shall require compliance with terms and conditions which will—

"(1) minimize damage to scenic and esthetic values and fish and wildlife habitat and otherwise protect the environment;

"(2) require compliance with applicable air and water quality standards established by or pursuant to applicable Federal or State law;

"(3) require compliance with regulations issued by the Secretary of Transportation under section 15 of this Act; and

"(4) require compliance with State standards for public health and safety, environmental protection, and siting, construction, operation, and maintenance of coal pipelines if such standards are consistent with or more stringent than applicable Federal Standards.".

"(l) Notwithstanding subsection (h) of this section, the Commission shall not issue a certificate under this section unless the Commission determines, in writing, that the coal pipeline or extension thereof will not have a substantially detrimental effect on surface or ground water at the point of origin from which the coal is to be transported, at the point of destination to which the coal is to be transported, and at the point of disposal of water utilized in the transportation of the coal.".

"(l) Notwithstanding subsection (h) of this section, the Commission shall not issue a certificate under this section unless the Commission determines, in writing, that the coal pipeline will not impair (1) the financial ability of any other carrier to provide transportation, or (2) the level or type of transportation any other carrier would be able to provide.".

"(l) The Commission shall require as a condition of issuance of a certificate with respect to a coal pipeline under this section that the pipeline carrier, upon application of any party tendering coal for transportation, shall construct, maintain, and operate upon reasonable terms a feeder or distribution line to connect the source of such tendered coal with the coal pipeline in any case in which such connection is reasonably practicable and can be constructed with safety and will furnish sufficient business to justify its construction, operation, and maintenance. Such feeder or distribution line, at the option of the party applying therefor, shall include any facilities necessary for the delivery of coal to such party in a form and condition suitable for use as fuel without further processing or treatment. If any pipeline carrier of coal holding a certificate issued under this section fails to install and operate any feeder or distribution line upon application in writing by any party, such party may submit a complaint to the Commission. The Commission—

"(1) shall hear and investigate such complaint;

"(2) shall make a determination with respect to the safety and practicability of such feeder or distribution line and the justification and reasonable compensation for such line; and

"(3) may issue an order, in accordance with subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, directing such pipeline carrier to comply with the provisions of this subsection.

Such order shall be enforced as provided for the enforcement of all other orders by the Commission, other than orders for the payment of money.".

"(l)(1) The Commission and the Secretary shall hold at least one public, formal adjudicatory hearing with respect to each application filed under this section. Any such hearing shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of section 554 of title 5. At least one of such adjudicatory hearings shall be held in the District of Columbia.

"(2) The Secretary of Energy, the Secretary of Transportation, and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall participate in each hearing held under this subsection and shall submit proposed findings and conclusions, exceptions to the decision or recommended decision, and supporting reasons for the exceptions or proposed findings or conclusions. The head of any other Federal agency may participate in any such hearing and may make the submissions described in the preceding sentence.

"(3) State and local agencies and other interested persons may, upon reasonable application, participate in any hearing held under this subsection.".

—Page 39, line 14, after the comma insert the following: "by jeopardizing existing contracts of and sales to small- and medium-sized coal producers, or otherwise,".

"§ 10956. Coal pipeline transfer, merger, and acquisition transactions

"(a) Any pipeline carrier providing transportation of coal under a certificate issued under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 shall, prior to—

"(1) transferring any coal pipeline or other property to any person;

"(2) consolidating or merging its properties with the properties of any other such pipeline carrier;

"(3) purchasing, leasing, or contracting to operate any properties of any other such pipeline carrier; or

"(4) acquiring control of any other such pipeline carrier through ownership of its stock or otherwise; submit an application to the Commission requesting the approval and authorization of the Commission, pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, to carry out such transaction. No such pipeline carrier shall enter into any transaction described in the preceding sentence in the absence of such approval and authorization.

"(b) Upon receipt of an application setting forth a proposed transaction pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Commission shall determine, after an opportunity for an agency hearing on the record, whether such transaction is consistent with the public interest. If the Commission determines that, subject to such terms and conditions and such modifications as it finds just and reasonable, such transaction is consistent with the public interest, the Commission shall issue an order approving and authorizing such transaction, upon such terms and conditions and with such modifications as the Commission may require.

"(c) In making its determination with respect to a proposed transaction under subsection (b) of this section, the Commission shall give weight to the following considerations, among others:

"(1) The effect of the proposed transaction upon adequate transportation service to the public.

"(2) The effect upon the public interest of the inclusion, or failure to include, other coal pipelines located in the area involved in the proposed transaction.

"(3) The total fixed charges resulting from the proposed transaction.

"(4) The interests of the pipeline carrier employees affected.

Page 42, line 18, strike out "10956" and insert in lieu thereof "10957".

"10956. Definitions.".

and insert in lieu thereof

"10956. Coal pipeline transfer, merger, and acquisition transactions.

"10957. Definitions.".

FEDERAL ENERGY REGULATORY COMMISSION REVIEW OF PRICES OF PIPELINE-TRANSPORTED COAL

SEC. 19. (a) Title VI of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-617) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 609. COMMISSION REVIEW OF CERTAIN COAL PRICES.

"(a) Whenever any State regulated electric utility and a coal producer enter into any contract for the sale of coal, and such coal is to be transported by a pipeline carrier providing transportation of coal under a certificate issued under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, such electric utility shall file a copy of such contract with the Commission.

"(b)(1) Within 60 days after the date a contract is filed with the Commission under subsection (a) of this section, the Commission shall determine, after notice and an opportunity for a hearing, whether the coal producer that is a party to such contract is a captive coal operation.

"(2) If the Commission determines under paragraph (1) of this subsection that a coal producer is a captive coal operation, the Commission shall then determine, after notice and a hearing, whether the price charged for the sale of coal pursuant to the contract filed with the Commission is reasonable. If the Commission determines that the price is not reasonable, it shall establish the price to be applicable to the sale of such coal.

"(c) If the Commission establishes the price for the sale of coal to a State regulated electric utility in accordance with this section, the Commission may petition the appropriate State regulatory authority for the initiation of a ratemaking proceeding or other appropriate regulatory proceeding relating to the rates or rate design.

"(d) As used in this section—

"(1) The term 'captive coal operation' means—

"(A) a coal producer that is owned or controlled by the State regulated electric utility to which it sells coal pursuant to a contract; or

"(B) a coal producer that, pursuant to an agreement with such a State regulated electric utility, mines coal which is owned or controlled by such electric utility.

"(2) The term 'control' has the meaning given such term in section 10102(7) of title 49, United States Code.".

(b) The table of contents of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978 is amended by adding after the item relating to section 608 the following new item:

"Sec. 609. Commission review of certain coal prices.".

Page 48, line 16, strike out "section 16" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 16 and 19".

Conform the table of contents in section 1 accordingly.

By Mr. ANNUNZIO:

(Amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute (text of H.R. 3646).)

—Add the following at the end of the bill:

TITLE IV—SOVIET UNION

(b) The Secretary may secure directly from any department or agency of the United States information necessary to enable the Secretary to carry out the Secretary's functions under this title.

DEFINITION

SEC. 405. For purposes of this title, the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of State.

SENATE—Monday, September 26, 1983

The Senate met at 12 noon and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Praise ye the Lord, Praise, O ye servants of the Lord, praise the name of the Lord. Blessed be the name of the Lord from this time forth and for evermore. From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the Lord's name is to be praised. The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens.—Psalm 113: 1-4.

God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Lord of all peoples and all nations, help Thy servants in Congress and the White House to find the way which transcends all prejudice and partisanship. In the effort to find peace internationally, help us not to make war among ourselves.

Let there be nothing in the heart and mind of any Senator which will prevent hearing those whose position is contrary. Remove all hindrances which would cause Thy servants to ignore the voice of the Holy Spirit speaking the wisdom of God to their consciences. Dear God, in the search for peace for others, may we be at peace among ourselves. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this is the beginning of a new week and Senators should be on notice that it will be a long and perhaps difficult week. In a moment I will ask unanimous consent to extend the time for the transaction of routine morning business until 2 p.m. to coincide with the time I am told that the war powers resolution will reach us from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. By statute, when that matter has been filed with the legislative clerk, it will become the pending business.

I have had preliminary conversations with the minority leader on how we will handle that matter obedient to the requirements of the statute, such as the division of time, such as the arrangement for the days of debate, and those negotiations are still underway. I hope, Mr. President, that we can dispose of the matter with debate on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, with a vote to occur sometime in the afternoon or evening on Wednesday at the latest. I anticipate that many Senators will wish to speak, however, and every effort will be made to accommodate their requirements.

Mr. President, this week we must also deal with the continuing resolution, for the fiscal year ends at midnight on Friday. There are a number of appropriation bills that have not yet been completed by both Houses and signed by the President.

I have talked with the Speaker of the House this morning, and it would appear that we are not likely to receive a continuing resolution from the House of Representatives until Thursday, maybe Friday, which will make it very difficult for us to complete action on that measure before midnight on Friday; maybe impossible. But in any event, I am obliged to say to Senators that a Saturday session is all but certain. If it is possible for us to complete the continuing resolution and to complete the extension of unemployment benefits, which also expires at midnight, before Saturday, I suppose we could avoid it. But I would say that has one chance out of a hundred, so I urge Senators to arrange their plans and schedule to be here on Saturday.

Mr. President, we will have the war powers resolution, continuing resolution, and unemployment benefits extension to deal with this week.

I do not plan to ask the Senate to return to the consideration of the State authorization bill this week in light of these other urgent requirements.

Mr. President, I will try to have a further announcement on the schedule of the Senate as the situation becomes more final in the course of the day, particularly as to the management of the time under the act for the debate on the war powers resolution and as I receive further information from the House on the continuing resolution and the unemployment benefits extension.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until 2 p.m.; that Senators be permitted to speak therein for not more than 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Once again, Mr. President, at 2 p.m. it is anticipated the Senate will turn to the consideration of the war powers resolution. I do not believe that today will be a late day, but we will stay as long as reasonably necessary to permit Senators to speak. As of this moment, I do not anticipate votes on the war powers resolution today. It is not impossible that that will occur or that a vote would occur in respect to a procedural matter such as to establish the presence of a quorum by an instruction of the Sergeant at Arms, but I do anticipate a full day tomorrow and Wednesday on that matter.

Mr. President, I believe I have nothing further to say at this moment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. BYRD. The majority leader does not rule out the possibility that an amendment or amendments to the resolution would be in order—there is no question about the possibility that they would be in order, but he does not rule out the possibility that there could be a vote or votes on such amendment?

Mr. BAKER. No.

Mr. BYRD. Or the tabling thereof?

Mr. BAKER. No. Mr. President, I do not rule that out. All I say is I do not anticipate votes on that measure today.

Mr. BYRD. Second, Mr. President, if the majority leader continues to yield——

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD [continuing]. I would ask the Chair, by beginning on the resolution at 2 p.m. today, does that not mean that the final vote on the resolution would have to occur no later than 2 p.m. on Thursday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I have any time remaining under the standing order, I yield it to the minority leader, if he wishes, or I will yield it back.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not have any need for it. I thank the majority leader. I yield back my time.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is a special order in favor of the distinguished senior Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON), who is not present in the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, without it being charged against his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no problem with that.

If the majority leader will yield, morning business will extend until 2 p.m. today. If Senators do not seek to utilize that morning business for speeches or if the majority leader has no transaction of business during that period, if he is agreeable, I might use that time, which would otherwise be lost, to make one of my statements on the Senate.

Mr. BAKER. By all means.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the limitation of time on Senators not apply to the distinguished minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I renew the request that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without it being charged against the time of the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are two items on the calendar under "Bills and Joint Resolutions Read the First Time" which were placed there in pursuit of the provisions of rule XIV, in order to take these items off the calendar. Since we adjourned on Friday and this is a new legislative day, I think we might as well proceed with those two items.

UNION DUES FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask for second reading of S. 1881.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1881) to prohibit use of compulsory union dues for political purposes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of that item.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I object, and I ask that there be no further action on this item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

COMMUNITY RENEWAL EMPLOYMENT ACT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, does the Chair wish to automatically trigger the other action?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be cited by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 1036), the Community Renewal Employment Act.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I object to further proceedings in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR GORTON

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see that the distinguished Senator from Washington is in the Chamber, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

BUDGET SITUATION/PNB ARTICLE

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, in the last week, the press has made much of the spectacle of the President's two top economic advisers—Treasury Secretary Regan and Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers Feldstein—openly disagreeing about the degree to which high deficits are linked to high interest rates. Flatly contradictory assertions by Cabinet-level officials make for good headlines.

I would suggest, however, that by focusing on the narrow question of the linkage between deficits and interest rates, the press has missed the real message in this story. This is not to suggest that the relationship of deficits to interest rates is unimportant. As business investment picks up, it is simply impossible for me to believe that the competition for funds which the private sector will face from the Federal Government will not bid up interest rates to a point far higher than would be the case with a significantly lower deficit. I recognize, however, that confusion over effects on real versus nominal interest rates, the timing of such effects, and the interference of other business cycle factors at least create room for some debate over these issues.

The real concern we should take from this exchange, however, is not over the narrow technical question of the empirical relationship between deficits and high interest rates. I suspect that in his heart, Mr. Regan would like to shrink the Federal deficit every bit as much as Dr. Feldstein. The problem is that Secretary Regan doesn't believe that tax increases will be used for this purpose. He said, and I quote:

> It's true that increased taxation will—temporarily—increase Federal revenues, and that a portion of such revenues may actually be sprinkled on the deficit. But the bulk of any increased tax revenues . . . will . . . be transformed into new spending . . .

In other words, Treasury Secretary Regan has lost faith in the ability of Congress not merely to cut spending, but even to hold the line on spending increases. He believes that the dangers of a large deficit are of a lower magnitude than the dangers associated with giving Congress more revenue subject to its disposition. This is a point which deserves careful consideration. I believe that Secretary Regan's loss of faith is premature. Unfortunately, however, time to prove him wrong is running short.

Mr. President, I used to fear that our huge deficits would soon lead to an abrupt and dramatic economic reversal. Now I almost fear that there will not be such a landmark event. If a near cataclysm were upon us, I have no doubt that Congress would act promptly and decisively. But if, instead, the deficits result in a prematurely slowed economy, in stagnation, and in an economy that moves in fits and starts, as I suspect may be the case, then the temptation will be strong to try to "muddle through." A dramatic reversal of our economic fortunes would at least provide some incontrovertible evidence of the immediacy of the problem at hand. But stop-start growth, and spotty weakness throughout the economy, especially in the credit-sensitive sectors, may not be sufficient to prod Congress to act. Or worse, they may prod Congress to act in the wrong ways—by enacting a host of programs designed to create special assistance for this or that sector of the economy, or so-called jobs bills which are likely to destroy as many jobs as they create. This course would make it easier to ignore the fact that the best jobs bill we could possibly enact would be to insure economic growth by reducing Federal credit demands.

We are all searching for the magic formula that will lead us out of this impasse. We all want a reduction in the deficit. Why have we not been able to find it?

One problem, I think, is that while all of us want to solve the deficit problem, none of us has made it his or her first priority. Each of us regards something else as more important. Liberal Democrats want lower deficits, but not at the expense of entitlements or any other domestic spending program; conservative Republicans decry deficits, but will not consider tax increases as even part of the solution. This is a prescription for deadlock and disaster.

Mr. President, I have been depressed in recent weeks to see headlines trumpeting marginally lower deficit projections as if they were actually grounds for realistic optimism. What solace can there possibly be in a deficit which is only $190 billion, rather than $210 billion?

Deficits of this order of magnitude are a threat to the current economic recovery. Recent economic indicators suggest that the strong recovery of the second quarter, led by consumer spending, is being followed, not unexpectedly, by more modest growth. Now observers are waiting for the "second stage" of the recovery to ignite. The key factor in this second stage must be business investment, as historically it is in all recoveries. Traditionally a lagging indicator, historical patterns would now have business investment increase significantly and spark further growth.

But what a terrible moment of tension this is. For it is precisely this event—the increase in business investment—which will precipitate the collision of public and private financing needs in our credit markets. In past recoveries, there always has been a pool of savings available to private investors to use to retool factories, buy equipment, and put people back to work. Now that pool is not there, for it is being absorbed by the Government's unprecedented demand for credit.

Of course, there will still be some investment. But to the extent it is not confined to maintenance and replacement of existing capital, it will be financed largely by foreign credit flowing to our shores, attracted by the high interest rates which must inevitably result from the Government's heavy borrowing. And what is the consequence of this fact? As foreign investors seek dollars to lend in our credit markets, they bid up the dollar's value, weakening our export industries, and resulting in still further loss of employment.

So the immediate impact of deficits is to threaten the current economic recovery. But there is an even more invidious threat in these deficits. Based on recent Commerce Department estimates, the total net domestic private savings generated by the U.S. economy this year will be approximately $178 billion. If we had a balanced budget, this would mean $178 billion to be spent on retooling our factories, on adding to the housing stock, on new plants and equipment. Instead, we, in Congress, will absorb this entire amount and more in borrowing to finance Government activities. Most of these Government activities are either current consumption or income transfers, almost all of which, in turn, will be spent on current consumption.

For 200 years, our economy has grown, enriching each successive generation, because we saved, and applied our savings to productive investments. Now we are running in place. We are not yet reducing our capital stock. But we have broken a pattern that has been ours since this country's founding—the pattern of every year passing on an increased stock of capital for ourselves and our children to work with. Unless we reverse this trend, our children will be clearly and noticeably poorer than they otherwise would be, and the fault will be ours.

This issue transcends the current economic recovery, important though that recovery is. Indeed, it strikes at the very foundations of our society. It calls into question the ability of people to plan and save for a better future, for themselves, and for their children.

The picture is indeed not a pretty one. It must be changed. But if we are to change it, all of us must be willing to consider measures that individually we find unattractive.

Mr. President, earlier this year, Congress passed a budget resolution which, though the Senate version carried my name, was almost no one's first choice—not even mine. But we did find a resolution which was acceptable to a majority. We must look again for such a compromise which will allow us decisively to reduce the deficit, and to live up to the terms of this resolution.

Clearly, this will require many of us to support measures we find distasteful. Even to come to a solution in this Chamber will be difficult, and everyone knows that the House of Representatives will approach this problem with a very different set of values. If a solution is to be found—and it is imperative that we find one—it will be found in the center.

I, for one, am willing to approach this problem with an open mind. I am willing to consider all serious proposals for compromise, and I will reexamine all of my own preferences and positions in this search. I ask that my colleagues do likewise: That we not allow our positions to harden into intransigence. The stakes are simply to high. I believe that this Chamber must take the lead in proposing a way out of the deficit maze. Experience has shown that it is the Senate, rather than the House, which is capable, at times like this, of generating a proposal with broad appeal.

In closing, I offer seven suggestions for steps which I believe Congress should consider in its search for a way to shrink the deficit. I believe that these principles can be guides to a specific budget proposal which, while not satisfying any individual completely, nevertheless addresses the overall problem in a fashion which should be acceptable to a majority.

First, we must examine closely—even ruthlessly—discretionary social programs that benefit largely the nonneedy. If the growth of spending is to be curbed, fairness demands that we abolish giveaways to those who do not need them.

Second, we must curb the projected growth of entitlement programs. The social security reform measure enacted earlier this year is proof that this can be accomplished, and the nearly disastrous rates of growth of some of these programs are evidence that we must.

Third, we must renew examination of our defense spending. Any Member of this body who is, as I am, a veteran of the armed services, knows full well that the Defense Department has its share of wasteful and unnecessary programs. We must avoid, however, unrealistic demands that the defense budget bear draconian cuts. With a deficit almost equal in size to the entire defense budget, reason tells us that the amount of savings we can reasonably expect to find here will make only a modest contribution to solving the problem.

Fourth, Congress must commit itself seriously to a broad program of tax reform and simplification. No one has more respect for the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee than I. I thank our good fortune that the Senator from Kansas is watching over the tax system, because I know that without him, the situation would be much worse. But even the distinguished Senator must be overwhelmed by the special advantages and tax expenditures that have invaded our Tax Code.

Many of these tax preferences were created out of the best of intentions. But in enacting these loopholes, we have created a monster. Not only are the direct costs of monitoring and enforcing the Tax Code unnecessarily high, but the indirect costs are even higher, as businesses and individuals undertake questionable economic activities and redirect resources in socially disadvantageous ways, solely for the purpose of exploiting this or that loophole in the code. Even more important is the loss of faith in the equity of our tax system which arises inevitably out of this mountain of special privileges woven through the Tax Code. If Federal assistance is to be given to a particular special interest, then let us do it by authorizing and appropriating funds to do so, and not by contaminating and eroding the Government's revenue-producing mechanism.

Fifth, we must redouble our efforts at making the Government operate more efficiently. The recent Grace Commission identified a long list of ways in which substantial public sector savings were possible. I do not agree with all of its recommendations. But even if we adopt only a small share of them, the deficit reduction can be substantial.

I take this opportunity to announce that, through the generous cooperation of private foundations in Washington State, I plan to make a special effort in this area. These foundations have agreed to provide support so that Mr. Glenn Pascall, an observer of Government budgeting with long experience in analyzing and evaluating the cost-effectiveness of Government programs, can apply his expertise to the problem of the Federal budget deficit. Mr. Pascall will be studying the Grace Commission report and other information, and formulating specific workable, passable proposals which can be drafted as legislation and considered during the budget process. I look forward to cooperating closely with Mr. Pascall.

Sixth, we must face the fact that revenue increases will be necessary beyond those which can be achieved by closing tax loopholes. Revenue increases on the order of $12 to $15 billion over 3 years will not do the job. The budget resolution adopted by Congress only 4 months ago called for revenue increases of $73 billion over 3 years. We had the budget debate then. It was a serious debate, which occupied this Chamber for several weeks. And nothing in our economic situation has changed to render the conclusion of that debate obsolete. It is time now to live up to our own resolution.

We must be realistic about the degree to which we expect to be able to shrink the budget deficit through spending cuts. We have not been able to build a consensus around spending cuts sufficient to eliminate a significant portion of the deficit, nor do I see any signs that such a consensus is about to emerge. We have already dealt with social security. I expect that we soon will extend Federal supplemental unemployment compensation. We will not dramatically cut medicare at any time in the foreseeable future. Yet these are the three largest entitlement programs.

On the defense side, we have voted to increase defense spending for the third year in a row. That leaves discretionary domestic spending—only 17 percent of the entire budget. Does anyone seriously believe that we will find further cuts in that 17 percent of the budget sufficient to yield a significant reduction in the deficit?

The conclusion is clear: There is no way in which the budget can be balanced without tax increases on the order of magnitude of those called for by the first concurrent budget resolution matched by spending cuts of approximately the same amount. Instead of asking whether we should raise taxes, we should be asking how we should find those new revenues.

Along these lines, together with the lines of spending discipline, I have noted with interest the recent proposal of the distinguished Senators from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN), and Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP). This proposal would reduce further both the tax-indexing adjustment and the cost-of-living-adjustment for non-means-tested programs to 3 percentage points below the rate of change in the consumer price index. It would raise $57 billion over 4 years. While I do not formally endorse their proposal, I congratulate those Senators for laying before the Senate a proposal worthy of serious consideration. It asks for some sacrifices across-the-board in every element in American society. This is an example of the kind of thinking we are going to require more of if we are serious about reducing the deficit.

Finally, Mr. President, and perhaps most importantly, we need to undertake the task of educating our constituents about their stake in this issue, and of recultivating in ourselves the public-spiritedness necessary to deal with it.

As I have said repeatedly, I know this all will not be easy. We have many difficult choices before us. But we are all in this together. Should we fail to deal with the budget crisis confronting us, history will not treat us gently. But we have the opportunity now to avoid history's harsh judgment, if only we will take it.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR WILSON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from California is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair.

CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise today at the suggestion of colleagues to place in the RECORD a letter which I sent to my colleagues reporting my recent visit to Central America.

An appendix to that letter is the recent statement by Mortimer B. Zuckerman, the chairman of the Atlantic Monthly, that was printed in the New York Times of Thursday, September 1, 1983. It is an extraordinary statement. I will recite just the opening paragraphs which I think quite clearly set the tone.

Because of enormous public confusion over the United States' involvement in Central America, I recently visited the region with a delegation of Congressmen to see it first-hand. I went holding political views of El Salvador and Nicaragua shared by many liberals and centrists in our nation. I returned impressed with the effectiveness of United States policy and convinced that we need to be involved.

I had thought that in El Salvador we were engaged in wrong-headed and dangerous military action on behalf of a repressive Government, and that Washington had failed to address economic and political grievances built up after decades of injustice. I went with the impression that the guerrillas seemed to have won popular support for their efforts to revolutionize the political system. My instinct was that this was only an internal struggle, not an East-West competition, and that once again we were backing the wrong side for the wrong reason.

But I returned home with the sense that United States military support was critical for physical security in the countryside, which, in turn, is necessary to guarantee ordinary Salvadorans' ability to make free choices. I also concluded that our military support is essential if we are to persuade the Salvadoran Government to democratize the political process and implement a program of agrarian reform and economic development. The guerrillas seem to have no larger a popular base than the Government does: Both sides command support with guns.

Mr. Zuckerman then goes on to detail the aggression that he encountered by the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

It was his statement further that:

It is the pressure of the United States backed threat of a military confrontation that has produced the Sandinistas' first clear willingness to negotiate a genuine agreement not to destabilize their neighbors.

Mr. Zuckerman's conclusion is that:

Our interests are involved because what happens in Nicaragua and El Salvador can affect Mexico or the Panama Canal. Central America is on our strategic doorstep. We cannot remain above the fray.

Mr. President, I commend all the paragraphs in between those that I have read. This is an extraordinary statement, a statement of intellectual honesty. It is a keen analysis of the situation as it genuinely exists within that region that Mr. Zuckerman so correctly views as essential to American interests.

My own Dear Colleague letter contains specific recommendations for what I think should be the U.S. course of action within Central America. Those neighbors of Nicaragua can be counted on to drive the Contadora process provided they feel that the United States will be a reliable ally, not in providing troops, which they have not requested and which President Reagan indicated will not be sent, but rather what they are asking us is an adequate level of support, militarily, economically, and diplomatically to provide them the kind of support necessary so that they can quite properly assure their own destiny as secure nations seeking to arrive painstakingly at the democratic reforms that have so long been absent from all of Central America, with the notable exception of its one true democracy, Costa Rica.

I quite agree with Mr. Zuckerman. An American presence is required if Central America is to achieve its promise. It provides the safety against the export of violence and subversion throughout Central America by the Sandinistan terrorists, the revolution without boundaries, and it also provides the leverage so that the United States, not just here in the Congress, but all across this land, can be assured that we will maintain progress toward democratic institutions and human rights.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entirety of my Dear Colleague letter, including the two appendixes, the first being that which I noted by Mr. Zuckerman, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE

Washington, D.C., September 20, 1983.

DEAR COLLEAGUE. Having recently returned from an eight day factfinding tour to all the Central American countries except Belize, I am more firmly convinced than ever that the course set by the Reagan Administration is the only effective one.

I met with heads of state, foreign and defense ministers, opposition political parties, members of the media, the clergy, private citizens and independent human rights organizations. I discovered I was the first U.S. Senator to visit Sandinista Nicaragua during the 18-month tour of Ambassador Quainton. (See Appendix B for list of persons with whom I met.)

I found that there exists among Honduras, El Salvador, Costa Rica and Guatemala, a new cohesion and unity in response to the threat these countries perceive from Sandinista terrorism and subversion, and almost uniformly strong support for Administration policies.

There was, however, very grave concern with regard to whether the Congress will allow the Administration to sustain a credible American presence in Central America. If the leaders of these nations are confident of continuing adequate levels of military, economic and diplomatic support, the Friendly Four will insist upon driving the Contadora process, as indeed, they should. It is their future which is at stake. They have the right to insist that it is they who must determine their own destiny. They are highly apprehensive that the Contadora process will seek to accommodate the Nicaraguans and Cubans by achieving a negotiated "peace" that will simply buy time for a currently beleaguered Sandinista regime and ultimately threaten the same result which a U.S.-negotiated "peace" brought to South Vietnam and Cambodia.

Based upon my observation and conversations with both the governments and their opposition and the private sector in each of the Friendly Four, I offer the following specific suggestions that would help further U.S. interests in Central America and lead to real and enduring peace.

1. The U.S. should increase the number of American advisors in El Salvador based on legitimate requirements up to some practical limit, say 200. The current requirement that no more than 55 advisors be present is absurd; it has produced great hardship and needless contortions in rotating needed personnel out of the country to allow others in so as to not exceed the arbitrary and artificial limit of 55. To put this figure in context, the D.C. Police Academy retains a full-time faculty of 48 to handle student loans that peak at 500 cadets. By comparison, the Salvadoran army currently numbers almost 30,000 for a nation of 5 million contrasted with a city of 600,000. Our advisors are doing a superb job, but are simply spread much too thin.

2. The U.S. should continue to sustain a military presence in the form of the present exercises by the carrier battle groups, joint exercises such as AHUAS TARA II, and the Regional Military Training Center established some months ago in Honduras.

3. The U.S. should encourage and support the Friendly Four in reviving the Central American Defense Community, CONDECA (a mutual defense pact between El Salvador, Costa Rica, Honduras and Guatemala), at the earliest possible date, to achieve military cooperation and political cohesion. Guatemala is eager to resume its role as host.

4. The U.S. should encourage the Friendly Four to act in concert and to insist for their protection upon negotiations that produce a specific and verifiable guarantee of their security by a specified date soon; or, if the Contadora process fails to produce that required early result, they should be encouraged to take appeal from a failed Contadora process to the Organization of American States. For obvious reasons, the venue for appeal must be the OAS which is responsible for regional affairs and not the UN Security Council.

5. The OAS should be encouraged to reconvene as an item of unfinished business the special session on Human Rights in Nicaragua. You will recall that during the Somoza regime, the OAS took the unprecedented step of interfering with the sovereignty of a member state and offered support and recognition to the Sandinista regime on the basis of written promises that the revolution would bring human rights and democratic institutions. The issue of human rights, specifically that of free elections in Nicaragua, should be a central theme of the Friendly Four, first within Contadora and, if necessary, later at the OAS. The Sandinista leadership, which took power in July 1979 with the backing of an overwhelming majority of the population, has yet to hold an election. In sharp contrast, Costa Rica is a fully functioning democracy; Honduras has a democratically elected government; and in El Salvador, another revolutionary government which came to power at the same time, as did the Sandinistas in Nicaragua, held a free and honest election monitored by hundreds of foreign observers and journalists in March 1982. You will recall that more than 80 percent of the voting population exercised its rights, despite a campaign of terrorism to frighten them away from the polls.

6. The United States should resume military aid to Guatemala and increase economic assistance from $40 million to at least $50 million requested by Ambassador Chapin. These people deserve our help.

7. Our present level of support in Central America is inadequate. Were we to increase it by half again as much to $1.2 billion, it would still represent a modest investment in comparison with what we spend elsewhere where American vital interests are less, and much less immediately threatened. More to the point, failure to provide adequate military, economic and diplomatic support now will simply defer the need to do so to a time when it will become far more costly and far more dangerous.

8. U.S. aid should continue to be accompanied by U.S. pressure for progress on human rights issues. In particular, it is essential that early, open and honest elections proceed in order for the Friendly Four to insist upon the same performance by Nicaragua on the quite accurate rationale that only genuine pluralism within Nicaragua can provide realistic assurance of peace for the entire region.

9. Both the government and the opposition within Costa Rica recognize the threat of Sandinista subversion through the workings of an existing fifth column. Present U.S. military assistance to Costa Rica to enable modernization of Costa Rican internal security forces is inadequate. I recommend that we provide the Costa Ricans needed and desired assistance up to $7.5 million.

Central America need not become another Vietnam. But it has the potential, if the Congress of the United States does not provide adequate support to Administration initiatives on the economic, military and diplomatic fronts.

The United States has vital interests within Central America which we did not have in Southeast Asia.

Several significant military differences make it possible for El Salvador to prevail over anti-government terrorists in ways that distinguish this situation from Vietnam.

The Central American nations to whom we are providing economic, military and diplomatic assistance in our own interests, are—with adequate United States support—in a position to prevent the violent exporting of the Soviet-Cuban-backed Sandinista revolution beyond the borders of Nicaragua. The United States owes adequate support to El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica and Guatemala, not because these nations are perfect democracies, but because it is required by the same U.S. self-interest that prompted President Harry Truman to insist upon U.S. aid to less than perfect democracies in Greece and Turkey when those nations were threatened with violent Communist takeovers following World War II.

What is more, progress is being made toward achieving a decent observance of human rights and the strengthening of democratic institutions in these nations which depend upon our assistance, but that progress is threatened directly by subversion from Havana and Managua. It would also be distinctly threatened by withdrawal of the American assistance that provides our missions in Central America the leverage by which we can insist upon and obtain reform.

The Friendly Four, Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala, are—I repeat—the nations whose future is at stake. They have the right to insist that it is they who must determine their own destiny. Hopefully, they will be able to do so by negotiation within a framework provided by the Contadora group. If the negotiations under the Contadora process do not provide these threatened neighbors of Nicaragua with a mechanism that assures their verifiable security, they will, instead, produce a false promise of peace and will buy time for Sandinistas and their backers to expand Marxism by further violence and subversion throughout Central America.

A negotiated "peace" which does not provide real and verifiable security against the threat of Sandinista "revolution without frontiers" would, indeed, produce in time another Vietnam.

To avoid this and to provide encouragement to a new unity among the fledgling democracies of Central America, the United States must demonstrate staying power on all three fronts—economic, military and diplomatic.

The United States Congress must support the Administration's initiatives if Congess is not itself to be guilty of creating a self-fulfilling prophecy by producing another Vietnam when, in fact, that result can be avoided—but only by adequate and sustained demonstrations of U.S. staying power within the region.

I have attached, as Appendix A, a recent New York Times guest column on Central America, written by Mortimer Zuckerman, the distinguished editor of Atlantic Monthly. It recounts the changed views towards the Central American situation that occurred to Mr. Zuckerman, after his recent trip to the region.

Sincerely,

PETE WILSON.

ON U.S. LATIN POLICY

(By Mortimer B. Zuckerman)

Because of enormous public confusion over the United States' involvement in Central America, I recently visited the region with a delegation of Congressmen to see it first-hand. I went holding political views of El Salvador and Nicaragua shared by many liberals and centrists in our nation. I returned impressed with the effectiveness of United States policy and convinced that we need to be involved.

I had thought that in El Salvador we were engaged in wrong-headed and dangerous military action on behalf of a repressive Government, and that Washington had failed to address economic and political grievances built up after decades of injustice. I went with the impression that the guerillas seemed to have won popular support for their efforts to revolutionize the political system. My instinct was that this was only an internal struggle, not an East-West competition, and that once again we were backing the wrong side for the wrong reason.

But I returned home with the sense that United States military support was critical for physical security in the countryside, which, in turn, is necessary to guarantee ordinary Salvadorans' ability to make free choices. I also concluded that our military support is essential if we are to persuade the Salvadoran Government to democratize the political process and implement a program of agrarian reform and economic development. The guerrillas seem to have no larger a popular base than the Government does: Both sides command support with guns.

In Nicaragua, the Sandianista revolution carried the hope for a better and freer life after the feudal tyranny of the United States-supported Somoza regime. Yet what I found was a Government busily consolidating a left-wing totalitarian state internally, and aggressively involved in attempting to overthrow its neighbors. It is the pressure of the United States-backed threat of a military confrontation that has produced the Sandinistas' first clear willingness to negotiate a genuine agreement not to destabilize their neighbors.

In El Salvador, the masses have not been angered to the point of largesacals popular uprising like those in Nicaragua or Colombia, popular revolt accompanied the guerrillas offensive in 1980-81, and last year's election showed that at least two-thirds of the people objected to being "liberated" by the revolutionary left. The guerrillas do not appear to have widespread popular support. In this situation, a military solution to control an insurgency is feasible.

To this end, the United States is training and equipping the Salvadoran Army for infantry and small-unit tactics and keeping the soldiers in the field to engage, harass and exhaust the guerrillas. We will have trained about 50 percent of the officers and noncommissioned officers by the end of 1983 in an effort to substitute effective combat leaders for those appointed for political loyalty. As a result, the Army has improved its morale and field performance and engaged in its most sustained and aggressive campaign. It has captured the momentum and substantial military control in much of the eastern provinces, particularly in San Vicente and Usulutan. The rebels have withdrawn to remote areas, have not counter-attacked, have limited themselves to hit-and-run attacks and appear to have increasing logistical and manpower problems.

In San Vicente, the Government has coordinated its military presence with programs in health, education, agriculture, transportation and reconstruction to retain the area's loyalty after the army leaves. This is a phase in an overall National Plan for Reconstruction. The cost of this program has been minimal by United States standards; only $65 million in military aid and $230 million in economic aid. Even the guerrilla political leader Ruben Zamora acknowledged to us that if this aid continues, the rebels can no longer hope to win the war.

The aid program also serves as leverage against the right-wing military. Only the United States can influence it to move away from a feudal political heritage of violence and vigilantism.

The left feeds off the rigidity of the right and military oppression and develops popular support by promising to redistribute the wealth. It also benefits when rightist oligarchies buckle under economic pressures. The best way to diminish popular support for a violent Communist revolution is to open up the political channels and institute agrarian and economic reform. This can take place only when there is no widespread military insurgency.

Our pressure brought about last year's Salvadoran election and this year's negotiations for drafting a new constitution leading to presidential elections in 1984. Elections may be only "one note in the song of democracy," as a Salvadoran clergyman put it, but they represent legitimization of potential civilian control over military and paramilitary forces. Both have perpetrated atrocities that, if allowed to continue, will turn the masses implacably hostile. Our pressure is thus necessary on two counts: to prevent an extremist left-wing takeover while pushing the Government toward rights and democracy.

However, no amount of change will end the Salvadoran conflict if Nicaragua, which regionalized the conflict in Central America, continues to fuel it. When they took over, the Sandinistas feared and hated the United States because of its patronage of Anastasio Somoza Debayle and military invasions over the past 130 years. The Sandinista hymn is "We fight against the Yanqui, enemy of humanity." President Jimmy Carter attempted to offset this by extending economic aid and friendship, but the Sandinistas remained convinced that the revolution would be safe from our intervention only if governments similar to their own were installed elsewhere in Central America. The Sandinistas set out to implement their slogan "revolution without boundaries."

In 1980, the Sandinistas, with Cuban advisers, brought the five main guerrilla factions from El Salvador together in Managua, worked out a unity pact, set up joint command and control structures, organized training and logistical support on Nicaraguan soil and provided initial arms supplies. A Salvadoran rebel leader, Mario Aguinada, told us that support for training, logistics and command continues.

In Costa Rica, we were told that the Sandinistas are engaged there in a major propaganda campaign and are encouraging unrest, including infiltration in the northern provinces. The attempt to destabilize Costa Rica, a democracy without an army since 1948, is the clearest indication of Sandinista intentions.

Inside Nicaragua, the Sandinistas began and continued a program of totalitarian consolidation of power. The elements of the broader anti-Somoza coalition were discarded one by one—the Roman Catholic Church, other political parties, the press. The only Jewish community center and synagogue were seized and burned. The Sandinistas built the largest military force in Central America. A Cuban-style pattern, with a widespread Cuban presence, has emerged.

To contain an interventionist Nicaragua, Washington sought—unsuccessfully—negotiations four times to bring about noninterference in neighboring territory and limits on Nicaragua's military buildup and the institutionization of democratic opposition to create internal brakes on aggression. Rebuffed diplomatically, the United States move militarily, ordering exercises, including fleet deployment. The Central Intelligence Agency expanded its support of the "contras"—the anti-Government guerrillas that harass the countryside. We continue to train and equip the Honduran Army which Nicaragua considers its most dangerous regional military adversary. A border shootout in May with Nicaragua brought about full mobilization of the Honduran Army, signaling its participation in any military crisis in the region.

The cumulative military pressure organized by the Reagan Administrator has resulted in a major shift in Sandinista policy. In our meetings with the Sandinista leadership, we were told that Nicaragua was prepared to negotiate verifiable nonintervention in neighboring territories, especially El Salvador. This change appeared to be due exclusively to the perception that the United States had been provoked to the point that a military confrontation was possible.

The United States has long supported repressive rightist regimes, sometimes by using our troops. We must develop an alternative to such regimes—and those of the left—by opening up Latin American political and economic processes. Our interests are involved be cause what happens in Nicaragua and El Salvador can affect Mexico or the Panama Canal. Central America is on our strategic doorstep. We cannot remain above the fray.

APPENDIX B—PARTIAL LIST OF PERSONS WITH WHOM SENATOR WILSON MET DURING CENTRAL AMERICAN TRIP

PANAMA

Minister Juan José Amado III, Minister of Foreign Relations and General Paul

Gorman, USA, Commander in Chief, U.S. Southern Command.

HONDURAS

Minister Edgardo Paz Barnica, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Minister Carlos Roberto Flores Facusse, Secretary of State for Presidency; General Gustavo Adolfo Alvarez Martinez, Commander in Chief, of the Armed Forces; Members of the Directorate of the Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN), a Nicaraguan group opposed to the Sandinista regime.

EL SALVADOR

President Alvero Alfredo Magana Borja, Provisional President; General Carlos Eugenio Vides Casanova, Minister of Defense and Public Security; Minister Fidel Chavez Mena, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Mr. José Napoléon Duarte Fuentes, Former President, (currently the Christian Democratic Party candidate, for President); Mr. Amando Calderon, Party Secretary, National Republican Alliance (ARENA); Mrs. Hernandez, Office of Legal Counsel to the Archbishop, Archdiocesan Commission of Justice and Peace; Officials of Unidad Popular Democratica, an El Salvadoran trade union.

COSTA RICA

President Luis Alberto Monge Alvarez; Vice President Alberto Fait Lizano, First Vice President; Minister Fernando Volio Jimenez; Minister of Foreign Relations; Minister Rodolfo Silva Vargas, Presidential Minister and Counselor for Finance and International Economic Negotiations; Mr. Rafael Angel Calderon Fournier (former Minister of Foreign Relations and Presidential Candidate, current head of Republican Calderonist Party); Mr. Alfonso Robelo (former member of Sandinista 5-member ruling junta, current leader of the Revolutionary Democratic Alliance (A.R.D.E.), a Nicaraguan group opposed to the Sandinista government).

NICARAUGA

Commandante Daniel Ortega Saavedra, Coordinator, Junta of the Government of National Reconstruction; Father Miguel D'Escoto Brockman, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Sub-Commandante Rafael Soliz, Secretary, Council of State; His Excellency Msgr. Miguel Obando y Bravo, Archbishop of Managua; Mrs. Miriam Arguello, National Coordinator, Conservative Democratic Party.

GUATEMALA

General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, Head of State and Minister of Defense; Mr. Fernando Andrade Diaz-Duren, Minister of Foreign Affairs-Designate; President Jorge Serrano Elias, President, Council of State; General Hector Mario Lopez Fuentes, Chief of Staff, Guatamalan Army; Most Reverend Jose Ramiro Pellecer Samayoa, Acting Archbishop of Guatemala City.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business with statements therein limited to 10 minutes each.

WHAT IS THE STATUS OF OUR NUCLEAR ARMS CONTROL EFFORTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, many Americans feel that the most important contribution this Government can make to the survival of our Republic and, indeed, of all mankind is to bring the nuclear arms race under control. I share that view. Editorial comments appeared over the weekend that dramatized how pitifully feeble our arms control efforts are, and how thin an understanding we have in this country, even among one of the wisest and best informed commentators.

On Saturday the New York Times carried a letter from Kenneth L. Adelman, the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in which he defended the meager resources devoted to our prime arms control agency which he directs. He admitted that ACDA's budget had dropped from the last full Carter year when it was $17.3 million to $16 million this year, but he said next year it will rise to $18.5 million. The New York Times, in an editorial accompanying Adelman's letter, notes that Adelman's figures ignore inflation, and brushes off the nearly 25 percent reduction in staff to the lowest level since 1962. Adelman concedes that his Agency's research budget has dropped from $3.5 million to about $1 million per year. That is a million, Mr. President, not a billion.

Mr. President, these figures are absolutely appalling. I recognize that we cannot solve problems by throwing money at them. And I certainly would not expect the arms control budget to be in the same league as the military budget. But the resources we are putting into this, the most crucial program for our survival, are so ridiculously infinitesimal as to be obscene.

Think of it—the entire budget of our arms control agency is little more than one-half the cost of a single one of our thousands of fighting planes. But the real killer is the contrast between the $1 million we spend on arms control research and the $25 billion—billion—we spend on military research and development.

That is literally $25,000 on military research for every single dollar we spend on arms control research. Now, some will argue that our military budget itself constitutes our real peacekeeper, our prime deterrent, that it is the military strength of this country and the billions we pour into our nuclear submarines, our nuclear armed air fleet, and our Minuteman missiles which keeps the Soviet Union from instigating world war III.

Well, I agree that we need most of that deterrent. And I agree that that deterrent has been the prime factor that has made the likelihood of a planned, premediated Soviet attack on this country very likely. But let us not forget that while such an attack is now one of the least likely causes of a nuclear war, there are other far more threatening prospective causes which the ACDA can and should help us meet. Furthermore, that massive and highly expensive military deterrent does little or nothing to deter what are the far more likely causes of a nuclear holocaust.

With the colossal, hair trigger buildup on both sides, the prospects of war by accident increase. Arms control research can search for and find ways of preventing war through mistake. With the continuation of the arms race, advancing nuclear arms technology will devise nuclear weapons that because in some cases they are cheaper and simple will be more readily available to more and more countries. The Arms Control Agency can and should be expending resources to devise strategies to prevent this.

Because a third world war could far more easily develop between a nuclear armed Libya or Syria and any number of its neighbors, or between India and Pakistan, or between South Africa and other African nations, or between Brazil, Argentina, and any number of enemies or potential enemies, the ACDA could contribute greatly to our chance of survival by working indepth to develop ways to stop nuclear proliferation.

Last year, Senator PELL pointed out that we employed six times as many people in military bands as we employ in the ACDA. That is right, in military bands. Today the ratio has gotten even worse.

The New York Times wisely disputes the Reagan administration's commitment to arms control in the editorial accompanying the Adelman letter.

But, then, Mr. President, on Sunday the Washington Post carried an editorial that, by Washington Post standards, was certainly a shocker. In effect, it asked, "What is the big fuss about the inadequancy of the Reagan arms control efforts compared to the Democrats' efforts?" It argued, after all, both Democrats and Republicans agree that the Russians behaved outrageously in shooting down the unarmed Korean airliner, and argued that President Reagan handled the vicious act by the Soviets right. And I agree he did indeed. The Post argued the President's handling was right in part because it did not deter him from pursuing arms control with the U.S.S.R. Again, I agree. But then the Post goes on to ask, So what is the difference on arms control? The Post then proceeds to give the commitment of the Democratic Party to the nuclear arms freeze by Democratic National Chairman Charles Manatt a "So what?" brushoff.

Maybe this is because the Post somehow does not recognize that the support of the Democratic Party—six of its seven Presidential candidates and our party chairman—to a comprehensive, mutual, verifiable nuclear freeze is anything special or especially different from what President Reagan is proposing.

Mr. President, the difference is like the difference between the research budget for the Defense Department and the research budget of the ACDA. That is about 25,000 to 1. The freeze would rightly or wrongly propose to stop the arms race, stop it cold. The Reagan proposals would limit some phases of the arms race, that is, intermediate missiles in Europe, the overall number of strategic warheads deployed by the United States and the U.S.S.R. But it would let the arms race itself and especially the most dangerous part of the arms race, the technological competition, speed ahead full blast.

It is too bad the Post cannot understand this. I think the great majority of the American people do.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Saturday, September 24 editorial from the New York Times and the accompanying letter from Director Adelman be printed at this point in the RECORD, and that the editorial from the Sunday, September 25 issue of the Washington Post, to which I have referred, also be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. ADELMAN PROTESTS

We may have been wrong about the new director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Kenneth Adelman, as his letter below insists. We envisioned a constructive recovery from the Administration's repeated budget cuts, personnel purges and damaging reorganizations that took place before his appointment. By denying any such butchery, he apparently sees little need for major improvements.

Mr. Adelman compares budget figures that are not comparable and pretends that 1984 dollars have the same value as 1980 dollars. The Administration's original 1984 request was $16.4 million, one-third less than the sum needed to match the 1980 authorization. The $2 million added last month doesn't close the gap. He also understates the research cut, again ignoring inflation, and seriously misstates its significance. He fudges the even more serious reduction in computer analyses of defense matters.

Although he had said his goals for the agency were "to staff it up and settle it down from the personnel turmoil," he now glosses over a reduction in authorized permanent staff, by last May, from 199 to 154, the lowest level since 1962. Officials with civil service tenure may not have been "fired," but many of ACDA's professionals were removed.

Our main and hopeful point was that Mr. Adelman, whose appointment we opposed, would improve research and make more negotiable the Administration's bargaining positions. His defense of the damage done to the agency before he arrived is not reassuring.

LETTER: FROM ACDA

BUILDING A BASE FOR ARMS CONTROL

WASHINGTON, SEPTEMBER 16, 1983.

TO THE EDITOR: Your editorial of Aug. 27 noted the constructive steps President Reagan is taking to "rearm" the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (ACDA) to insure that it is a strong and effective force in formulating and implementing U.S. arms control policies. We are very well pleased with the concrete steps the President has taken to strengthen ACDA's funding, staff and clout. The Time's caution regarding these moves may be fair at this stage, but the false and incomplete reports in the editorial are not fair to your readers.

Yes, ACDA has regrettably had more than a fair share of woes over the years, including some recent problems. But The Time's claims that the agency has experienced a 30 percent cut in the budget, "bureaucratic butchery," purges and a wipeout of its central records office under the Reagan Administration are simply not true. Your comments on the computer, library and research budget give an incomplete and inaccurate picture as well.

The budget reductions in fiscal years 1981, 1982 and 1983 were nowhere near 30 percent. Today ACDA's budget is $16 million compared with expenditures of $17.3 million for the last full Carter year (1980). Our budget request for next year will take us to $18.5 million. Moreover, despite much ado about an impending "purge" at ACDA, no career ACDA official has been fired during the Reagan Administration.

All needed computer programs and a core computer staff were retained, while other key analytical personnel from that division were integrated into the ACDA bureaus they support. One of our computers was moved into the State Department building where ACDA is housed, and we have contracted for outside computer time to fulfill our additional needs.

The ACDA library was not dismantled or "shipped off." Part of the collection was moved under our roof while another part is now close by in the George Washington University library. Apart from significant cost savings, moving the collection has made it much more convenient for ACDA users and scholars.

Finally, The Times states that our research budget was cut from $6 million a year to $1 million. In fact, ACDA's research budget was cut from about $3.5 million to just over $1 million a year. Yet from what I have seen, no essential research has been sacrificed to save these tax dollars. If our level of research proves inadequate, it will be boosted.

Sound arms control is critical to world stability, and ACDA is a central force for successful arms control. With the momentum of a reinvigorated agency, I am confident that we can effectively pursue what is one of the most comprehensive arms control programs offered by a U.S. administration.

KENNETH L. ADELMAN,
Director, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

A HAUNTING ANNIVERSARY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the year 1983 marks the 50th anniversary of Adolf Hitler's rise to power. Within 12 short years, the Nazi government he headed had exterminated perhaps 8 million people. This anniversary keeps echoing across the half century because we are often reminded of its legacy.

Former Nazi officials in charge of extermination still turn up; some are even harbored within this country. Look at the cases of Klaus Barbie and Romanian Orthodox Archbishop Valerian Tirfa. Barbie, known as the Butcher of Lyons, was a S.S. officer charged with atrocity after atrocity. Tirfa was a member of a Romanian pro-Nazi organization, who concealed his past, and rose to a powerful position in the Romanian Orthodox Church in America.

Recent publicity about the Hitler diaries, which turned out to be forgeries, kept attention on Hitler and the movement he lead to power. Several months ago, ex-S.S. officers held a reunion which ended in violence. These continuing events should keep us ever mindful of what happened 50 years ago, and what could happen again.

The world must be informed about the dangers of genocide. Too often, people have a tendency to ignore, obscure, overlook, or just plain forget what happened. Some, a malignant few, wish to rewrite history and whitewash Hitler. Perhaps others are ashamed that mankind could be capable of such horrible acts or believe it could not happen again. But we must not ignore the evidence. In fact, this evidence provides the most powerful reason to use every resource at our command to eliminate the possibility of genocide.

We must take two complimentary actions. Public education will help keep alive the searing memories of past genocides and warn us that we must be vigilant to prevent the spread of this dread disease. But we can do more by creating an international law which outlaws genocide. Such a law would demonstrate that all nations believe that genocide is abhorrent and not to be tolerated.

In 1948, in response to the horrors of the Nazi regime, this Nation lead the way in drafting such a law. Shall we now abandon our leadership? I answer "no" and urge the Senate to ratify the treaty.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THANKSGIVING

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, at a time when much of the world is engulfed with waves of humanism, I find myself remembering Thanksgiving morning of 1982 when I attended a little Anglican Church in Bern, Switzerland. I had gone abroad at the suggestion of the President, to attend the GATT Ministerial at Geneva. While in Switzerland, I visited Zurich and Bern.

Mr. President, the minister at St. Ursula's Anglican Church in Bern is Rev. John S. Keefer, an attractive and eloquent man. I was inspired by the manner in which he drove home the point that the freedom of mankind is inseparably liked to our Creator. After the service, noting that the Reverend Mr. Keefer had preached extemporaneously, I asked if he would reconstruct his sermon paper so that I might share it with my colleagues, and with others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

He has done so, and now that we are but 2 months away from Thanksgiving Day 1983, I think this splendid sermon will be all the more meaningful as we approach the day set aside each year for Thanksgiving.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Reverend Mr. Keefer's sermon be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the semon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. URSULA'S ANGLICAN CHURCH BERN, SWITZERLAND

"Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart, be always acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer, Amen"

This Thanksgiving morning I would like to draw your attention in particular to the Old Testment lesson in Deuteronomy, chapter 28, upon which, I am told, the President lays his hand when he takes his oath of office. We have read only the first fourteen verses of this chapter, which tell those things which would bring blessing to the nation of Israel long ago. Moses spoke these words to Israel right before she was ready to march into Canaan, the Promised Land:

"And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all His commandments which I command thee this day, that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth; and all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God."

Then follows the catalog of blessings we have just heard read. But it must and should be added that there is a similar catalog of curses immediately following the blessings! Moses continued:

"But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all His commandments and His statutes which I command thee this day, that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee. Cursed shall thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field. Cursed shall be thy basket and thy kneading-trough. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy cows, and the flocks of thy sheep. Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out."

And it goes on and on! What is so sobering is that the list of curses goes on for 54 verses whereas the blessings comprise only 14 verses (though, thanks be to God, listed first).

But before we can proceed further and apply these blessings and curses either to ourselves or to any other land, we must ask the fundamental question whether we or any other nation are allowed to apply what was intended for a nation 3500 years ago to our situation today? Is it allowed that we are gathered together here at St. Ursula's Church in Bern and all across the great land of America to give thanks to Almighty God for his blessings bestowed upon us—not just as individuals but as a nation, as a land? Is it proper for example, that there is a cross on the top of the Swiss Parliament building here in Bern? Or that the English pray for their "Christian Sovereign" that God may spare her, scatter her enemies and make them fall? In other words, dare we (or any other nation) assume (or better put, presume) that we are a 20th century version of ancient Israel, called by God's Name, and, therefore, as recipients of His rich blessings, bound to render Him the thanks and honor due His Name and, in return, repent for those things of commission and omission we have done so that we would be spared, in turn, the curses? Many especially in our own land, would say a definite "NO!" They would argue that we have no right to assume the perogatives of ancient Israel nor does any other land. God is not dealing with "nations" anymore as He had with ancient Israel but rather only with individuals, calling them out of all nations, tribes and tongues from the four corners of the earth into the everlasting Kingdom or nation of His dear Son. Therefore, no nation, as a nation, can call itself a Christian land. Only individuals are Christian. Likewise, there is no proper concept of a "national righteousness"—only righteous individuals amidst a rather lost and fallen nation and world.

While granting certain aspects of this view, I, nonetheless, think it is fitting that we, as a land, are gathering together to render to Almighty God the thanks due His Name for all His manifold blessings to us. I think it is also fitting, for example, that we stamp on our money, "In God We Trust." I believe, furthermore, that there are both theological and historical reasons to make the claim that the God of our Land is indeed the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of ancient Israel, and that we are responsible to Him in all things—including those that involve national life and righteousness. One could say much on this subject—too much for this occasion (so you can all breathe a sigh of relief!)—but I would like to present some theological and historical arguments in favor of my thesis.

First of all, God has always been concerned for entire peoples and nations and not just individuals. He chose Israel, in fact, as a nation; for we know that even in Israel there were individuals who were not worthy to be called Israelites (Romans 9:6-7). The prophet Isaiah depicting the greatness of God and man's insignificance could say (40:15): "Behold, the nations are like a drop from a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance . . ." God sent Joseph to the land of Egypt that through his wisdom both Israel and Egypt might be spared from famine. God sent the prophet Jonah to Ninevah that he might preach repentance to a city that was facing imminent danger because of its exceeding wickedness. Much to Jonah's disappointment, everyone in this Gentile city repented, from the king to the least of the people; and God spared the city. Jonah, of course, was angry; and God rebuked him for his unmercifulness (4:11): "And should not I spare Ninevah, that great city, in which are more than 120,000 persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?" Recall how God used Daniel in the court of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius to guide the destiny of all the nations and peoples of the civilized world. Or later, how God executed His will for Israel through Cyrus the King and would call him by the prophet Isaiah (44:28ff), "My Shepherd, My anointed, whose right hand I have held to subdue nations before him." The same prophet Isaiah predicted, according to St. Paul, the Gospel coming to the Gentiles (Romans 15:12): ". . . there shall be a root of Jesse, and he that shall rise to reign over the nations; in him shall the nations trust." Notice that Christ came not merely to reign over individuals but over all nations of the earth. Hence His title: "King of Kings and Lord of Lords". All history looks forward to the day (regardless of one's eschatology or doctrine of last things) when the kingdom(s) of this world shall become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ and He shall reign forever and ever. Just as ancient Israel as a nation, St. Paul tells us, was removed for a season from the covenant of Abraham, allowing those blessings to come upon the Gentiles, so it allows, I believe, that the Gentile nations could be grafted into (or removed from!) the covenant tree as God sees fit. Can we deny, for example, that in A.D. 312 Constantine, the Roman general, saw the sign of the Cross in the sky with the words, "In this Sign conquer", went on to defeat his rival Maxentius at the Milvian bridge in Rome, and thus established Christianity as the official religion of the Roman empire, of which we in Europe and America are the descendants?

The "formal" discoverer of the Americas was Christopher Columbus, whose entire world view was firmly grounded upon biblical prophecies concerning the climax of world history and the personal return of the Lord Jesus Christ. He believed that Christ's return and the formation of His universal Kingdom could not take place until all nations and tribes of the distant isles had been evangelized. Only then could the promised new age come into being. As Columbus urges his near-mutinous sailors to sail on through uncharted seas in the Fall of 1492, his zeal and assurance were not derived from love of adventure or greed for gold and glory but were founded upon the revealed Word of God in Scripture. He regarded the successful outcome of his voyage as confirmation of the truth of Scripture and the faithfulness of the sovereign God who had graciously decreed the opening of new lands and tribes to the Gospel of the Savior Jesus Christ. And so he named this first landfall "San Salvador" ("Holy Savior"). Thinking more specifically of our great land that stretches from sea to shining sea, one is reminded of the Spanish settlement in St. Augustine, Florida, with its Castillo de San Marcos and chapel therein. Or Sir Francis Drake's chaplain reading a Service from the English Prayer Book on St. John the Baptist's Day, June 24, 1579, near what would later become the beautiful city named for St. Francis. One also thinks of the first permanent English settlement at Jamestown, Virginia, on the other side of the continent, where the Prayer Book service was instituted. Or of the Spanish priests and missionaries who evangelized the Southwest, who, when they saw those western mountains turn a deep red as the sun set upon them, called them the Spanish equivalent of "Blood of Christ". But perhaps this historical connection between our Land and God is shown most dramatically in the coming of the Pilgrim fathers in 1620, whose religious beliefs molded and formed our ideals and institutions so strongly and to whom we owe this national feast day of Thanksgiving. They, of all the peoples who colonized America, had a burning conviction that they had a special mission to fulfill in life. They sincerely believed they had a "divinely appointed destiny" and thought of themselves as "being chosen for a special mission in the world". They suffered many hardships in their journey across the stormy Atlantic Ocean, yet when they waded ashore at Plymouth, Massachusetts, according to their first governor, William Bradford, "they fell upon their knees and blessed the Lord of Heaven who had brought them over the vast and furious ocean, and delivered them from all the perils and miseries thereof . . ." Before they had landed, they had drawn up what is known as the Mayflower Compact, which begins:

"In the name of God, Amen. We whose names are under-written . . . having undertaken, for the glory of God and advancement of the Christian Faith and honor of our King and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia . . ."

Our nation was, therefore, founded "for the glory of God and advancement of the Christian Faith"! Later, when God blessed their efforts, they came together and held a great feast to give thanks for His bounteousness to them. We, their children, celebrate that occasion today. Later in 1630, John Winthrop, governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, wrote:

"We shall find that the God of Israel is among us, when ten of us shall be able to resist a thousand of our enemies, when He shall make us praise and glory . . . For we must consider that we shall be as a City upon a Hill . . ."

This same Mr. Winthrop gave as his foremost motive for founding a settlement in America, "the carrying of the Gospel into America and erecting a bulwark against the kindom of Antichrist." Later, when the Articles of Confederation were drawn up, they began: "Whereas, we all come into these parts of America with one and the same end; namely to advance the Kindom of our Lord Jesus Christ and to enjoy the liberties of the Gospel in purity . . ." It is obvious, therefore, that the First Amendment to our Constitution was never intended as a separation between God and the State; rather, only a separation between an established Church such as existed in Europe and England and the State. This we must never forget, as our forefathers did not.

Alexis de Tocqueville (a French scholar and historian) made a tour of our land during the 1830's in order to study the American experiment in freedom. He traveled as far east as Boston, as far west as Green Bay, as far north as Sault Ste. Marie and Quebec, and as far south as New Orleans. By steamer and stagecoach where possible, on horseback through the wilderness regions of the northern, western and southern frontiers, he traversed over 7,000 miles of this country and Canada before sailing again for France. He was fascinated with what he saw and made a number of predictions about us, one of which was that America would always be a land of freedom whereas he saw Russia always being ruled by some form of totalitarian, brutal government (then the Czars, now the Communists). (Interestingly, he also saw the two lands rising to power at the same time in history!)

After his tour of America, he wrote down his impressions of us and attempted to show why America was so great. He had seen her fertile lands, her many and great rivers and streams, all her geographical advantages; but that was not where America's greatness lay because many other countries had the same. He thought to find the secret of our greatness in our growing cities, factories, and manufacturing and rich mineral resources; but therein alone did not lie her greatness, for many other lands also had these. He carefully studied her laws and democratic institutions but was not convinced that here was where her secret lay, for some of the laws he felt actually endangered her existence. Finally, he concluded that the secret to America's greatness lay in the manners and customs of her people, that is, to the whole moral and intellectual condition of her people. He went into our churches, where he heard the preaching of righteousness; and there he discovered why America was great. He said that on his arrival in the United States the religious aspect of the country was the first thing that struck his attention and that there was no country in the world where the Christian religion retained a greater influence over the souls of men than in America! America was great because America was good; and if America ceased to be good, she would cease to be great. That is saying only in other words what the Puritan fathers believed and what God through Moses had said to Israel long ago before they entered the Promised Land (Deut. 30:19):

"I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore, choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live."

I take you forward in history now to recent events of our land and the world: that of space and moon exploration. Had another nation done in space what we have done, would the world have heard the glory of God being proclaimed from space by the reading of Genesis 1, "In the beginning God . . ."? Surely not by the astronauts of the other superpower, one of whom boldly and foolishly proclaimed God did not exist because he had looked around out there and did not see Him! Many of us remember the astronauts reading from the Bible on Christmas Eve as they sped toward the moon; but I suspect few of us knew what Buzz Aldrin, a devout Christian, did upon landing on the moon: he took Holy Communion! He describes it this way (The Anglican Digest, XXIV (Transfiguration A.D. 1982), 39 citing Guideposts):

"So I unstowed the elements in their flight packets. I put them and the Scripture reading in the little table in front of the abort guidance-system computer. Then I called back to Houston. 'Houston, this is Eagle. This is LM Pilot speaking. I would like to request a few moments of silence. I would like to invite each person listening in, wherever and whomever he may be, to contemplate for a moment the events of the past few hours and to give thanks in his own individual way.'

"For me, this meant taking Communion. In the blackout I opened the little plastic packages which contained bread and wine. I poured wine into the chalice my parish had given me. In the one-sixth gravity of the moon, the wine curled slowly and gracefully up the cup. It was interesting to think that the very first liquid ever poured on the moon, and the first food eaten there, were consecrated elements. Just before I partook of the elements, I read the words which I had chosen to indicate our trust that as man probes into space, we are in fact acting in Christ [Italics not in the original]. I sensed especially strongly my unity with our church back home, and with the Church everywhere. I read: 'I am the vine, you are the branches. Whoever remains in me, and I in him, will bear much fruit; for you can do nothing without me'."

Somehow, when I read that, it made me feel good and good for America as a land having a claim to being grafted into the True Vine; for without Him we could not have accomplished this certainly marvelous achievement for all mankind. Moreover, through various expressions of the astronauts we, as a land, gave God, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, the honor and thanks due His Name. Thus, it is indeed our bounden duty and service as a nation to set aside a day of national Thanksgiving to Almighty God for His manifold blessings to us as a nation and as individuals, to ask His forgiveness for our national and personal sins, and to implore His continued guidance, protection, and blessing upon our land, families, and people as we seek to do His will and be that "City set upon an Hill".

In closing I would like to add that it is easy to criticize your country just as your own family because you live with all the faults everyday; and we have our share of faults. Furthermore, from what I can gather the problems back home are in a pretty "healthy" state. (It makes one wonder if we are not the recipients of some of the curses instead of the blessings.) But having lived outside the United States for awhile and experienced how other people act and think, I find myself saying again and again, "God bless America". We at least are trying to do something right; we intend to do what is right. We shall be singing the hymn, "America, the Beautiful", and I would like to draw your attention particularly to those words which are my prayer and aspiration for our land:

"America; America; May God thy gold refine,

Till all success be nobleness, and every gain divine."

Let us pray: Almighty God, who hast given us this good land for our heritage; we humbly beseech thee that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of thy favour and glad to do thy will. Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion; from pride and arrogance, and from every evil way. Defend our liberties, and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom in thy Name we entrust the authority of government, that there may be justice and peace at home, and that, through obedience to thy law, we may show forth thy praise among the nations of the earth. In the time of prosperity, fill our hearts with thankfulness, and in the day of trouble, suffer not our trust in thee to fail; all which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

A CHOICE WE MUST MAKE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, recently I had the privilege of reading the text of a sermon delivered by a splendid young minister in my State, Rev. Robert F. Simms, pastor of Green Memorial Baptist Church in Charlotte.

The Reverend Mr. Simms was born in Williamston, N.C., and attended Wake Forest University and Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. He holds the master of divinity degree. He has served pastorates in Texas, South Carolina, and North Carolina.

Mr. President, the sermon by the Reverend Mr. Simms that so impressed me was entitled, "A Choice We Must Make." It is based on Acts 5: 29.

In a moment, Mr. President, I shall ask unanimous consent that the text of this splendid sermon be printed in the RECORD because I believe it is entirely relevant to issues that simply must be confronted by Congress. But before I do that, Mr. President, let me quote just one paragraph from the Reverend Mr. Simms' remarks:

It has come as a great eye-opener to me that some of us Christians have helped along . . . government persecution and denial of religious freedom by being more concerned with cries about separation of church and state than we have been with the preservation of our own religious freedom.

Mr. President, I urge Senators to study this sermon, and I ask unanimous consent that its full text be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the sermon was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHOICE WE MUST MAKE

(By Rev. Robert F. Simms, Pastor, Green Memorial Baptist Church, Charlotte, N.C.)

Some choices are extremely difficult to make. There are times when a course of action must be taken, selecting between two options, but we do not want to forsake either for the other. I have come to the point at which I believe it is likely that Christian Americans will have to make one of those difficult choices. It is a choice between to familiar goals, both of which command the respect of hosts of people. It is a choice to side with the forces which have declared themselves as guardians of one of two treasures and seem dedicated to show undivided loyalty to them. One is the goal of preserving the proverbial separation of church and state; and the other is the quest to preserve, or rather to establish, America as one nation under God. Most Christians I know would like to have both as strong realities; but I am afraid that given current development, it is nearly impossible to pursue both—at least as they are perceived at the present time.

It has not always been impossible to be on the side of both liberty and godliness. When our nation was founded, religion was strong, the Christian faith dominated, and it was not perceived to be a threat to freedom of religion that the country's founding documents spoke of God and his creation, or that elected officials were strong churchmen, or that those who were exercised leadership on the basis of their faith and its morality. But the frightening trend at this moment is to interpret the constitution as virtually prohibiting even the mention of God in any publically funded institution, much less the overt involvement of public funds or buildings themselves in any religious activity. And this trend is no fad: It is a well-established policy, becoming firmer daily by the precedents being set in courtrooms and council chambers across the land.

It has come as a great eye-opener to me that some of us Christians have helped along that kind of government persecution and denial of religious freedom by being more concerned with cries about separation of church and state than we have been with the preservation of our own religious freedom. To some, "separation of church and state" means the same thing as "religious freedom." But they are not identical. Separation speaks mostly to the government's obligation to make "no law respecting an establishment of religion." Freedom speaks mostly to the people's right to pursue their religious convictions. These two parts of the First Amendment must be kept in balance least either be misinterpreted, or interpreted in the extreme.

What has happened is that the government, at the urging of various parties, has begun to pry into the affairs of the states, their institutions, and even the auxiliaries of churches, to find points of contact between religion and public life—as if there were anything illegal about religion influencing people's lives or the government's operation; and, in the process of trying to "keep the government out of religion," they have gotten themselves into it in a negative way—the restriction of religious freedom.

The issue is clouded by rhetoric on both sides, and it is not likely that it will be resolved by debate, or that the balance between the two emphases of the First Amendment will be restored by simply trying to see both sides of the issue.

I am coming to be convinced that the time is upon us to choose which is more important to us—preservation of the principle of church/state separation as it is currently interpreted, or one nation under God—and follow that course with all fervor.

I hasten to say that I believe firmly in both the religious goal of our nation being godly, and in the democratic principle that the government not be entangled in religion. But I am convinced that in order to restore both, we must work from a solid establishment of one of them. More to the point, freedom of religion in this country was established because of the strong convictions of the people who founded and inhabited it. But the First Amendment, which originally helped inspire the flourishing of religion in America, has now come to be interpreted in a way which inhibits the same. And, since the official word from the government is that "the constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is," we who believe in the continued right of religious people to affect and influence their country, seem to be on a collision course with law and bureaucracy. That predicament necessitates our making the hard choice to resolve to pursue what is right in the sight of God no matter what is handed down to us in the form of regulations or restrictions.

I find basic inspiration for this conviction in the words of Peter when he was confronted by the Sanhedrin, as recorded in Acts 5:29. Here was the overt conflict of Government and religion. In that moment, Peter gave us a motto for perilous times such as these: "We must obey God rather than men." We would prefer that the time did not come when we had to make a choice between obeying God and obeying man: we wish the governments of men always required those things we would do any way, as a matter of Christian duty. And we wish we were prohibited from doing only those things we are commanded by God not to do. But we are entering days in which we are not only prohibited from doing what our faith would convince us is right, but required to do that which our God says is wrong. We must choose whom to obey.

WHY THIS CHOICE IS NECESSARY

I know there are some classic objections to being anything less than supremely diligent in safeguarding the separation of church and state. It is argued that if we lose religious freedom we will not enjoy the privileges which enabled us to become one nation under God. On the other hand, when the current purge of religion from anything remotely public or governmental has ended, what makes anybody think that the government will any longer guarantee the freedom of religion?

I am afraid that if we do not choose to favor one over the other goal, we shall speedily lose both objectives. More to the point, if we do not put ourselves more to the task of injecting the witness of God into the nation by whatever means we can—culture, education, and public life—we can bid farewell to religious freedom as we have known it, and we will find ourselves in a nation that knows not God.

One reason things have gotten this way is that Christians (as well as members of other faiths) were not sufficiently watchful when the trend against religion in public life began. The Scopes trial of 1925, where evolutionists argued for, and won, the right to teach evolution in schools, should have sounded a loud warning-bell in the church's ear. But instead of hearing a rising up to the challenge, religion has turned increasingly inward since those days, and by the sixties and seventies it seems that most Christians apparently believed that religion is a private thing that has no place outside the home or the four walls of the church building. That attitude, of course, has just fed the onslaught of anti-religious thinking, and hastened the day of persecution.

Undeniably, we are under persecution, now. What else can it be called when the government has taken away tax-free status from a religious school—as if they had the right to remove it? What other name is there for government intrusion into the hiring practices of seminaries? What do you call the prohibition of a prayer group in an unused classroom before school hours? All these things are happening, and their occurrence is increasing.

Of course, the ultimate power behind the movement of humanism and atheism is Satan. The subtlety of his plan has apparently been to confuse the issue of religious freedom in such a way that many Christians have worshipped at the shrine of the Bill of Rights while ignoring the onslaught of hostility against religion; as a result, we now face a time when the prevailing interpretation of our First Amendment rights leads us away from what we thought we were protecting—which is our free exercise of religion. Consequently, the only reward we get for supporting the separation of church and state is the development of a godless state and a persecuted church.

I think many Christians are laboring under the misconception that everybody who cries, "Keep church and state separate!" is our friend. Not so. Such organizations as the American Civil Liberties Union have frequently shown themselves to be antagonistic toward religious interests; when they claim their cause stems from the First Amendment, they mean something far different from what I believe that amendment to be saying. The ACLU is just one of many sources instigating legal action against supposed violations of "religious freedom" or "civil rights" which have the underlying purpose of eliminating hated religious views from a particular place.

Yet, many Christians have joined the bandwagon of freedom fighters, just because they carry the banner of an amendment which the church has held dear for two hundred years of American History. Unwittingly, those Christians have hurt their own cause, by forgetting their first rightful priority.

If, by favoring every cause that claims to befriend religious freedom I actually play into the hands of those who eventually persecute religion, what good have I done?

If, by carrying the separation of church and state so far I help to insure the hostility of government and society at large to religious institutions, whom have I helped?

If I press for neutrality in officialdom on religious matters, do I not rob them of their religious freedom? And whose liberty have I perserved?

Granting the fact that there may have been some genuine violations of religious liberty which have been corrected, the main effect of the governmental vendetta against religious influence has been not the establishment of an ideal neutrality toward all religious persuasions; it is not that innocent. Rather, in effect, we are experiencing the establishment of an anti-religion religion, or, more properly identified, Religions Humanism. The choice to pursue the godliness of America over the relatively minor issues of keeping religion out of public institutions becomes more obviously a wise one in the light of the poison that Religious Humanism is. The problems of tuition tax credits, or fears of state-written prayers, pale in the face of the gargantuan enemy Humanism.

Hamanists have identified themselves as being essentially religious in nature. The Humanist Manifestos of 1933 and 1973 give that label to their signers and advocates; and it is significant that the Supreme Court of our land acknowledged the religious nature of humanism in court cases tried over twenty years ago. And yet, that same court has continued to make decisions which yield to humanist doctrines over those of some other religion. In so doing, the court has established a religion.

The chief difference between this religion and traditional religions is that humanism has no supreme being—man is its god. But this does not mean that there is no doctrine or systematic beliefs; on the contrary, these things are well established. The Manifestos outline these beliefs in shocking clarity, indentifying one of the main goals of Humanism as the alteration of all religion to reflect only the supremacy of man and his perception of his needs. This is the deadliness of Humanism: it has no churches that one would recognize; it is ecumenical and nondenominational; and it masquerades as simple logic or common sense. That Humanism has often been mistaken for rational, clear thinking has kept many people unaware of its rapid growth or its true nature. In fact, many people have become humanists without realizing it. It is that subtle.

This fact only serves to intensify the need to take a decisive stand for the Christian faith and for the witness of God in public life, in order to combat the pervasive cancer of Humanism, which is already solidly entrenched in the halls of government and in the policies of many institutions which have bowed to government pressure and have adopted humanistic government guidelines.

WHAT THE CHOICE INVOLVES

In essence, what America needs is a counter-revolution. We are already in the last stages of a revolution, one of values, morals, and ethics. Laws are being changed, as much by court precedent as by legislation, to reflect this revolution, which is taking us helter-skelter into a future knowing no absolutes, except the gratification of man in his conceit. A counter revolution is called for, one in which Christians in particular both diligently seek the conversion of millions of Americans and also get involved in politics to stop the bureaucratic and judicial flow of humanistic lava which threatens to inundate us all.

I believe the time has come to take an unapologetic stance and resist any further elimination of religious language from public life and institutions. We must fight any attempt to rob any religious agency or auxiliary of its right to tax-free status, and staunchly resist interference from government in affairs rightly governed by religion. And, we must insist that our government abide by the definition our own constitution affirms: that "we have been endowed by our Creator with certain unalienable rights," which include liberty in the matter of religion. God gives us these rights; the government only recognizes them.

Further, I believe it is imperative that Christian Americans press on to regain lost freedoms, and to reestablish certain lost guarantees. I call on our congress to pass an amendment to the Constitution guaranteeing the right of persons to pray or otherwise exercise their religion in any public place, including public schools.

Concerning such an amendment, I am aware that it is argued that it would be misinterpreted by states and courts. For that reason, I would want the wording of the amendment to be extremely clear. But a violence to our rights and our Constitution has been done because of the Supreme Court decisions of the 1960's, and that violence needs to be corrected and reversed. Even if it seems redundant to propose an amendment concerning religion in the presence of the First Amendment, I believe the symbolism of passing such an amendment is far more important than the risk of being wordy. A prayer amendment would say, "We want to have what we had before the courts began tampering with it; we want the country we had before those who are so concerned with our religious liberty made us afraid to exercise it."

WHAT WILL BE THE RESULT OF OUR CHOICE?

I am not sure I am personally prepared to be so confident in our ability to accomplish this monumental task that I could easily and glibly say, "We can do it if we try." It may be that the die is cast. But if we could only stem the tide, it would buy time for many persons to hear the gospel in a still-free country. In any event, whether or not we might succeed is not relevant to the choice we must make. We must do what is right in the sight of God. We must obey God rather that man. We must call the nation to God without fear of contradicting a corrupted understanding of church/state separation. God help us to come to the point at which we cannot help but do these things.

PRIVATE SECTOR INITIATIVES TO FEED AMERICA'S POOR

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, recently I was privileged to preside over an Agriculture Committee hearing on private sector initiatives to feed America's poor, the purpose of which was to gather information about some of the diverse feeding efforts being undertaken by the private sector.

The hearings produced some encouraging testimony. Eleven articulate and enthusiastic witnesses described the splendid programs being operated by their churches and other private organizations. The creativity of the private efforts is most commendable. These and other private efforts underscore that there is still great personal compassion in this country, there is still a willingness to assume personal responsibility, including personal involvement.

The hearing record will be made available, when printed, so that other interested Americans will be able to assess whether similar programs could be undertaken with similar success in their communities.

One of the private sector efforts which has demonstrated great diversity is a church in western North Carolina.

Rev. Parker T. Williamson, minister of the First Presbyterian Church in Lenior, N.C., outlined the many activities sponsored and supported by his congregation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Reverend Williamson's testimony and an editorial, "Helping Others Is What It's About," from the Lenior, N.C., News-Topic be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF REV. PARKER T. WILLIAMSON, MINISTER, FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, LENOIR, N.C.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Senate Agriculture Committee, the people of First Presbyterian Church in Lenoir, N.C., believe that Jesus Christ's mandate to feed the hungry is not negotiable. We have tried to fulfill that commission through a variety of ministries in our community. These efforts include direct feeding and developmental assistance in which we administer both private and public funds.

Like many churches we collect canned goods and non-perishable foods to feed to the poor. We distribute them through an ecumenical service organization called "Yokefellow Christian Ministry." Yokefellow's food pantry, used clothing room, and voucher system to assist with rent, utilties and medicine costs provides a needed emergency response to the immediate needs of poor people.

In addition to our Yokefellow contributions, we maintain a Ministers' Discretionary Fund for direct aid purposes. Much of this money is used to help familes whose needs are certified to us by the Caldwell County Department of Social Services. We try to help fill the hunger gap, for example, which lies between the date on which a client has been approved for Food Stamp Assistance and the date on which he receives that assistance. Disability determination and other government programs include a period of bureaucratic delay during which the poor would starve without community help. Our direct aid seeks to buffer that period.

Another direct feeding program in which we have been involved is the Nutrition Program for the Elderly. While this effort is funded with federal dollars it requires a great deal of local support in order to meet the need of its client families. The Nutrition Program in our county was launched by Blue Ridge Community Action, Inc. (BRCA) in our church buildings. Food was prepared in our kitchen and served in our fellowship hall. Additional food was prepared at this site for delivery to elderly and disabled persons who could not come to the church for their meal. This "Meals on Wheels" extension of the Nutrition Program was heavily staffed with volunteers from our church and wider community.

Recognizing the need for extensive volunteer support to assistance programs, First Presbyterian Church offered its facilities to the Retired Senior Citizens Volunteer Program (RSVP), a federally funded effort to discover the talents of older persons and deploy them in areas of need. RSVP has been an important link in our food assistance work.

When the Nutrition Program grew to a production of 600 meals per day, a level which our church kitchen was not designed to handle, we saw a need for another community effort. Together with other volunteer groups like United Way, clubs and church organizations, we built a central kitchen facility. Local contributions to this construction project totaled $110,000. We equipped it with a grant from the N. C. Division of Aging.

We make this central kitchen facility available to BRCA which provides food to 7 nutrition sites (many of them are churches) and to the children of our church-sponsored day care center.

Caldwell County's community Action Agency (BRCA), offers an impressive list of services to our area's poor. The Presbyterian Church has been proud to assist this local group in its efforts. Our church provided a grant of $9,500 to purchase a mobile cannery and initiate a community garden project organized by BRCA. Land owners made areas available for community gardens. Low income citizens could use an area of the garden for a contribution of $10. In return for their contribution they received seed, fertilizer, plowing and disking services. All labor other than tractor work had to be their own.

During the first year of this project each $10 plot produced $75 worth of food. Approximately 280 low income families increased their food purchasing power through this blending of their labor and community assistance.

The mobile cannery, purchased by a Presbyterian gift, has greatly expanded the capacity of low income people to feed themselves. This propane gas fired cannery is mounted on a trailer frame which can be moved to scattered sites in our rural county. Often school parking lots are used for the cannery operation.

Participants may bring the produce from their gardens, prepare it for canning on the site, purchase jars and lids at a very low cost, and can their food for the winter months on the spot.

This blending of labor equity by our low income clients and assistance from public and local sector sources has produced impressive results. During the first full year of the cannery operation (1976) 2,143 quarts of foodstuffs were processed. One step above our direct feeding efforts, this program helps low income families to feed themselves. It offers assistance while preserving the dignity of the participant who must invest a small amount of cash and a great deal of labor toward his family's food production.

The city of Lenoir is a short driving distance from Ashe County, N.C., a rural, mountainous area where many people live below the poverty level. These people are poor, but they are also proud. Many of them would rather die of malnutrition than accept a government dole. Thus assistance must come to them in an acceptable form, one which honors their dignity and their personhood.

The church is an ideal conduit for assistance in Ashe County; for the church is seem not as an "outsider" but as an extension of family. Seizing that opportunity a Presbyterian minister, Dr. Robert Stamper, who is as unique an individual as the people whom he serves, operates a ministry of compassion to the housing, clothing and hunger needs of mountain people. This man who would happily spit in the eye of both governmental and ecclesiastical bureaucrats offers an impressive service to his neighbors.

Our congregation sends money, clothes, food, and volunteer workers to Ashe County regularly. Living in a lodge owned by Dr. Stamper, work groups from our congregation and others go out among the hills and hollows to plant gardens, repair houses, cut timber for elderly people who heat and cook with wood, and provide many chore services to help them survive bitter mountain winters.

The Presbyterian Church in Lenoir sponsors several ministries which—while not direct feeding programs—have a significant impact upon family living conditions, income, and, therefore, the capacity of a family to feed itself. Together with several black churches in our community we created a development corporation which borrowed $580,000 from the Farmers' Home Adminstration and developed a community of 98 homes on 100 acres of land for low-moderate income families. By developing the land on a non-profit basis we were able to provide our clients with sufficient "instant equity" to qualify them for otherwise unobtainable mortgage money. This initial entry into the realm of home ownership has encouraged a healthy pride and self-respect among our client families.

The Presbyterian Churches of Lenoir created a non-profit corporation to house our elderly citizens. We borrowed $2½ million from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, invested over $100,000 of our local resources and thousands of volunteer hours from some of the best minds in our city to build a retirement community where citizens are accepted for residence without regard for their ability to pay the full fee.

My presentation to you today outlines programs initiated by our church and local partner groups which receive funding in a variety of ways. Some of our work operates with 100% local funds. Other activities represent a partnership with state and federal government programs. In the latter case we insist upon the preservation of local initiative and local control, and, in most of our partnership experience with government, we have been pleased with the outcome of our joint effort.

My experiences with these endeavors has led me to some observations and opinions about private and public sector partnerships. My chief conclusion is that you who represent the public sector need us (the private sector). Government programs, however well intended, when left to themselves, tend to institutionalize themselves until a great deal of the money which you appropriate feeds the service machinery and only a trickle reaches those for whom the appropriation was intended. Partnerships with local philanthropic organizations reduce this cost significantly.

Government programs, however well intended, tend to become "faceless" and impersonal. Client families become numbers and needs are categorized into abstractions. This putrefication of government programs encourages a "dole mentality" among the recipients and fertilizes a seedbed for graft. Partnerships with local philanthropic organizations tend to personalize assistance.

Government programs, however well intended, tend to move toward mediocrity in service delivery. Salaried bureaucrats rarely demonstrate an ethusiasm for the purposes of the program which motivates uncompensated overtime or other evidence of personal involvement. Further, the bureaucratic mentality tends to be negative. One rarely gets in trouble with his superiors for saying "no" to an innovative idea which involves risk. By their very nature, therefore, bureaucracies become cumbersome as they follow the "safe" track. In a dynamic society where the needs of our people change forms continually, this tendency results in a bureaucracy out of touch with the needs which it was designed to meet.

Partnerships with local philanthropic organizations introduce a passion for the project from enthusiastic volunteers, and an infusion of innovation from local people who know the problems first hand and seek refinements in service delivery.

I applaud the fact that your committee has chosen to hold hearings on private sector initiatives in feeding America's poor, and I hope that the resulting legislation will recognize the valuable public-private sector partnerships which are possible as we target this task together.

HELPING OTHERS IS WHAT IT'S ABOUT

The people of Caldwell County care about their fellow man, and Wednesday the nation learned just how much our citizens practice the teachings of Jesus Christ by feeding the poor.

As federal nutrition dollars have decreased, programs for the elderly and children have had to tighten their belts. The congregations at many churches have filled the gap with programs geared to getting food to those in need.

The U.S. Senate's Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Foresty, conducting hearings Wednesday in Washington, learned how churches across the nation are helping—one of those churches is Lenoir's First Presbyterian.

The Rev. Parker T. Williamson, speaking before Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., and others, told how his church has made feeding the poor a major ministry to the community.

The church is involved in a community effort to feed the elderly and children and helped, along with other churches and organizations, establish a central kitchen to prepare food which is then taken to nutrition sites around the county to feed those who would go hungry otherwise.

The church also bought a mobile cannery which is taken to varous sites so people can take produce, buy jars and lids, and can foodstuffs for the winter.

The church also helps the needy through a community garden where prople can, for only $10, raise food to help take a step up the ladder away from total assistance.

First Presbyterian's community involvement goes far beyond the annual food basket at Thanksgiving and Christmas. It speaks to us all by giving an example we should attempt to follow—becoming involved.

Caldwell County is blessed with many churches and service organizations, all taking it upon themselves to help where they can.

Wednesday, the nation learned our people do care and are willing to work hard to help those needing a boost.

Of course, programs like these only work when local people are involved. That was the message Rev. Williamson took to the Senate.

BETSY BRIAN ROLLINS: A REMARKABLE LADY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I would call to the attention of my colleagues the appointment of a splendid North Carolina citizen to the President's Task Force on Food Assistance.

Mrs. Betsy Brian Rollins of Durham is one of the most industrious and compassionate people I know. She has spearheaded an amazing private sector effort to feed the poor at St. Phillip's Episcopal Church in Durham.

Mr. President, this program is a model of what can be done—through private, volunteer means—to feed the deserving poor in our Nation.

I commend President Reagan for having recognized the importance of this and other private sector efforts by including Betsy Rollins on this important task force which is to examine the causes and extent of hunger in America. John Driggs, chairman of the board of Second Harvest, and John Perkins of Voice of Calvary Ministries, two other members of the task force, also have had extensive private sector involvement in feeding the poor.

Indeed, I conducted some hearings recently to examine private sector initiatives to feed America's poor. Much can be learned from these diverse and creative efforts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial, "Caring for the Hungry," from the Durham Morning Herald, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Durham Morning Herald, Sept. 7, 1983]

CARING FOR THE HUNGRY

Mrs. Betsy Rollins' appointment to the President's Commission on Hunger draws fresh attention to Durham's compassionate approach to caring for hungry people.

Mrs. Rollins is director of the Community Soup Kitchen at St. Philip's Episcopal Church, a volunteer program that provides free meals weekdays for people who might not eat otherwise.

She has also been a sparkplug in the effort to raise $525,000 to build an Urban Ministries Center behind St. Philip's—a campaign that is near the point that construction can begin.

The center will become the headquarters for the soup kitchen as well as Meals on Wheels, a volunteer project that delivers more than 150 hot meals to shut-ins five days a week.

A third element in Durham's response to hunger needs has been the annual CROP walk to raise money for international and local programs through Church World Service. This year's walk raised a record amount—more than $25,000.

Together, the three projects have a common denominator: They are volunteer efforts and rely on no government supervision or direction. They represent, in the best sense, a conscientious response to President Reagan's call for an increased voluntary role in meeting social services needs.

They also represent a whale's share of cooperation among congregations—Protestant, Catholic and Jewish—that have in these works shown greater concern for needy people than for their theological differences.

As has been evident in her work for the soup kitchen and Urban Ministries Center, Mrs. Rollins takes a special empathy to her new assignment on the hunger commission. A former newspaper reporter, she is legally blind and she knows well what it means to have someone else extend a helping hand.

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I support the Baker resolution that will come before us shortly. I support the Baker resolution because it will avoid a constitutional confrontation with the President at a time when the marines are being shelled and fired upon in Lebanon.

Now, this is not to say I have changed my mind about the fact that the marines should not be in Lebanon. I have not altered my opinion.

Instead I am saying that Congress cannot and should not try to legislate the marines out of Lebanon. We do not have the constitutional authority to order them out.

The President has the last word over the deployment and use of the existing Armed Forces no matter what Congress might do today. I am happy to support the Baker resolution because it is an alternative to the far worse proposal by the Democratic Party Caucus which would attempt to usurp the reins of military direction from the President.

Also, I should mention that, in my opinion, section 2(b) of the Baker resolution, which would trigger section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution, does not mean a thing. We will not make an unconstitutional piece of legislation valid by simply referring to it in a second piece of legislation. The war powers resolution is probably the most unconstitutional measure Congress has ever passed and it will remain unconstitutional even if we pass the Baker resolution with section 2(b) in it and the President signs it.

Now, Mr. President, I would like to discuss the general subject of the war powers and the folly of congressional efforts to tie the President's hands in making military decisions.

Look at what happened in 1975 when President Ford asked Congress to join with him in the decision to evacuate Americans from Saigon. As you will recall, Congress never granted his request.

Caught between the choice of strict adherence to the 1973 statutory prohibition on U.S. activities in, over, or from off the shores of Indochina and his duty to uphold the lives and interests of his countrymen and women, President Ford ignored the legislative restriction and took into his own hands the protection of Americans.

Weeks later, while Congress was still tied up with its debate on the matter, President Ford announced that the Indochina evacuation was completed. Then, he pleaded for funds to pay for purely humanitarian assistance and transportation of refugees, but Congress rejected this request the very next day.

Mr. President, this episode reveals all too clearly the inability of Congress to act decisively in time of need. Last Tuesday I mentioned an earlier moment in history when Congress also neglected its duties. It was a time when only the strong actions of President Franklin Roosevelt, taken independently of Congress, enabled this Nation to aid Great Britain and thereby defend our own security before Pearl Harbor.

The point is that the President had the vision to see that democracies avoid disaster only by confronting the obvious threats to their survival. Yet if the war powers resolution had been in effect in the early 1940's, President Roosevelt could not have landed and kept troops in Greenland, he could not have sent and reinforced several thousands of marines on Iceland, he could not have escorted British shipping in the Atlantic and he could not have done the many other things, several of them held secret at the time even from the State Department, which prevented a total collapse of resistance to Hitler. The war powers resolution would have brought about a complete disaster in the 1940's, and it may well bring about a catastrophe of similar proportions in the future if it is not repealed.

The fact is that the United States, as the strongest free nation in the world, has a stake in preventing totalitarian conquest. The President has a duty to resist challenges in the early stages and cannot wait until the challenge is so clear that the cost of resistance is prohibitive.

The danger in the war powers resolution and any other legislative effort like it which is intended to restrict the President's defense powers is that it takes away all flexibility to deal with unforeseen events. The failure of Congress to approve even humanitarian legislation to support the evacuation of American citizens from Saigon offers convincing proof that Congress cannot be counted on to deal quickly with future problems as the need arises. Unlike the President, an assembly of 535 Secretaries of State does not rush to decision.

Mr. President, anyone who reviews history will know that Presidents have always exercised independent defense powers, whether or not their statutory authority was clear, and occasionally, in the face of direct Congressional restrictions. In fact, Presidents have used force or the imminent threat or force on more than 200 occasions without any Congressional declarations of war.

George Washington settled this issue, when, as our first President, he ordered his Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, to threaten Spain with military force if she would not open the Mississippi River to navigation by American citizens. When he became President, Thomas Jefferson sent a squadron of armed ships into the Mediterranean without any Congressional authority, with orders to sink, burn and destroy vessels which may threaten American commerce. Only half a year after he issued his military orders and four months after a naval blockade and battle had occurred did Jefferson inform Congress.

Jefferson gave an indication of the principle which guided his decisionmaking, when he wrote on September 20, 1810, that:

> A strict observance of the written laws is doubtless one of the high duties of a good citizen; but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of higher obligation.

Jefferson's concise statement summarizes why the Framers vested the President with independent powers to act for the safety of the nation. The majority of Framers had served in the army or militia during the War of Independence and they were intimately familiar with the restrictions which the Continental Congress had imposed on General Washington's activities, restrictions they knew had nearly lost the American Revolution. It was in order to correct this known weakness of the Articles of Confederation that the Framers made the President the "Commander-in-Chief" under the new Constitution.

We can also turn to the words of the Framers themselves. For example, Geroge Mason said at the Virginia Convention to ratify the Constitution:

> Although Congress are to raise the army . . . the President is to command without any control.

Mason refused to sign the original Constitution because it did not include a Bill of Rights, but he attended the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and was active in shaping the final document. He knew what it meant.

The active role of governors in putting down civil disorders just prior to the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the evolution in early State constitutions from weak executives to strong executives, the memory of interference by the Continental Congress with military decisions of General Washington, and the entire course of practice under the Constitution from the Administration of President Washington to the current Administration of President Reagan, all demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt that the power to employ the existing forces of the United States in defense of United States citizens and the survivial of our country, in reaction to foreign dangers, was and is vested with the President.

Yes, Congress is given certain of the defense powers. Congress has the power of the purse. Congress can "declare" war. But the text of the Constitution does not say that Congress "makes" war, and the Framers specifically rejected such a proposal.

This does not mean that Congress is without any leverage. Congress can reduce the size of the Army, Navy, Marines or Air Force. Congress can prevent the construction of any additional nuclear aircraft carriers by not appropriating the money. The Senate can reject Presidential appointments of Ambassadors or Executive officers of the Defense and State Departments. But once the military forces are established and equipped, it is for the President alone to decide how to deploy and use those forces.

Whatever the power of Congress may be, history shows that it is dangerous for Congress to intervene in military command decisions. Therefore, I urge that we approve the Baker Resolution which has the advantage of postponing any Constitutional confrontation over this matter for at least eighteen months, long before which I hope events will have allowed the President on his own authority to have withdrawn the forces from Lebanon.

A GRACEFUL EXIT FOR MR. WATT

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, we are all aware of Secretary Watt's latest verbal outrage. His chronic foot-in-mouthitis is drumming up ever-increasing demands for his resignation.

I submit that there is even greater reason for Mr. Watt's ouster than his offensive mouth. That is his offensive public record as Secretary of the Interior.

I submit, Mr. President, my civil indictment of James Watt as public enemy No. 1 of the American environment. Long after Watt's words are forgotten, Watt's record will haunt us.

Here are just a few of the highlights of Mr. Watt's devastating record as Secretary of the Interior.

First. Mr. Watt is the first Secretary of the Interior to advocate opening our 80 million acres of our wilderness up for oil and gas drilling.

Second. Mr. Watt's coal-leasing program has cost taxpayers $100 million by placing too much Government-owned coal on the market at a time of recession and slack-demand.

Last week, days after the House of Representatives had passed a moratorium prohibiting more coal leases, Secretary Watt opened five main tracts of land for bid in the Fort Union area. Only five bidders showed up.

Third. Mr. Watt has gutted the Office of Surface Mining by reducing the staff by half, especially deep are the cuts in inspectors, and continues to approve permits to companies that have failed to reclaim other leased lands.

Fourth. Mr. Watt has pledged time and time again to simplify the Federal regulations in the Interior Department, especially in the Office of Surface Mining.

Fifth. Mr. Watt has been rebuked twice by Federal courts and found in violation of laws governing the coastal zone management for the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, one of our country's most sensitive areas.

Sixth. Mr. Watt has proposed and continues to push, over congressional opposition, for over 1 billion acres of land off California shores to be open to the oil industry.

Seventh. Mr. Watt ordered stopped the Youth Conservation Corps, which provided summer jobs for youths and introduced many city kids to our natural resources.

Eighth. Mr. Watt has virtually put our National Park Service to a standstill by placing a moratorium on future land acquisition, and his refusal to spend money appropriated by Congress to expand our parks. Last year Congress added $10 million over Mr. Watt's requested budget to help take care of our deteriorating parks.

Ninth. Mr. Watt has opposed the National Park Protection Act, which is designed to alleviate threats to our parks natural resources.

Tenth. Mr. Watt has announced that he would like to change the 25-year-old policy of not allowing oil and gas and commercial development in our wildlife refuges.

Eleventh. Mr. Watt has consistently opposed the Federal/State cooperative us of the land and water conservation fund, which gave Federal assistance to States and local communities to develop local parks.

Twelfth. Mr. Watt had ended the successful urban parks program.

DEAR ABBY NOTCHES THE NOTCH

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, in the past 2 weeks, I have had a flood of letters from constituents who are concerned that, as so-called notch babies, they may be receiving smaller retirement benefits than other people.

This issue was raised in a recent "Dear Abby" column and readers were advised to write their Senators and Congressmen.

The volume of mail that followed is testimony to the great popularity of the "Dear Abby" column. Unfortunately, in this case, there was some confusion about the facts. When this problem was brought to the attention of Abigail Van Buren she promptly set the record straight with a second column.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Kansas City Star of September 22, 1983, explaining this situation be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Kansas City Star, Sept. 22, 1983]

ABBY CORRECTS ERROR ON BENEFITS

WASHINGTON.—Columnist Abigail Van Buren, heeding advice from Uncle Sam, is correcting erroneous information she published that prompted a flood of letters and calls to Congress and the Social Security Administration.

The whole thing started when the syndicated "Dear Abby" column alerted newspaper readers to what was called an "inequity" in Social Security retirement benefits for persons born from 1917 to 1921.

Social Security officials said Wednesday they had sent their own letter to Abby, asking her to correct her column on the so-called "notch" that ran Sept. 5. The corrected information was published in The Kansas City Star Tuesday.

In the first column, someone who signed herself "Notch Year Baby" complained that persons born from 1917 to 1921 would get lower Social Security benefits than those born before and after those years.

Miss Van Buren urged readers of her column to write to their congressman protesting this inequity.

In fact, due to a foul-up in a Social Security benefit formula that Congress wrote in 1973, those born in 1916 or earlier do get higher Social Security benefits. A retiree who turned 65 in 1981 can get as much as $110 a month more than a co-worker who paid the same taxes but was born in 1917.

That benefit formula was driving the system into bankruptcy and Congress voted in 1977 to correct its error and to phase out the formula.

It left the formula intact for those born in 1915—who would first be eligible at age 62 for early retirement benefits in 1976—and it provided a less generous, transitional benefit for those born from 1917 to 1921.

That group will get less than the 1918 babies, but their retirement benefits will still be higher than those for persons born in 1922 or later.

Jim Brown, a spokesman for Social Security, said Social Security offices and congressional offices were inundated with thousands of calls about the "notch" since Miss Van Buren's advice appeared.

The notch has been widely reported previously and an attempt by some lawmakers to raise the retirement benefits for those in the transitional group failed last year.

Alan McDermott, managing editor of the Universal Press Syndicates, which distributes Dear Abby, said the new column was sent out for use Monday but editors were told they were free to run it before then.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader has made arrangements for me to speak at some length during morning business. I have indicated that I will, as in the past, of course, yield to any Senator who comes on the floor who wishes to make a statement, or if the majority leader wants to transact business, in the event of which, if such should occur, I ask unanimous consent that there be no interruption shown in the RECORD with respect to my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE UNITED STATES SENATE

THE SENATE, 1884-1892: WATERSHED YEARS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in this address and the next in my continuing series on the history of the U.S. Senate, I shall deal with the last decade and half of the 19th century. The late 1880's and the 1890's were a watershed not only in the Senate's history but in American history as well. On the one side stretches the old America—an America that was overwhelmingly rural and agricultural, that devoted its prodigious energy to the conquest of the continent, that enjoyed relative isolation from Europe and the rest of the world, that, despite a depression in the 1870's, was optimistic. Over the horizon loomed the new America—an America predominantly urban and overwhelmingly industrial, inextricably enmeshed in world politics and world wars, wracked by convulsive changes in population, economy, technology, and social relations, and troubled by ominous problems that threw their shadow over the promise of the future.[1]

By the late 1880's, the generation that had fought the Civil War was passing from the stage, and a new generation that knew Pickett's Charge and Fredericksburg only as history was coming before the footlights. Colonels and generals in faded blue and gray still could attract a following, but the most memorable politicians at century's end had only dim memories of the conflict. William Jennings Bryan was born the year of secession, and his great rival, Theodore Roosevelt, was just a baby when the first shots of the war rang out at Fort Sumter.

No permanent moratorium on "waving the bloody shirt" was achieved, but the effectiveness of this device to incite old war time antagonisms declined and, with this, its deployment. From every quarter came signs of increasing national harmony. In November 1884, Century Magazine began a series of reminiscences by Union and Confederate soldiers, "Battles and Heroes of the Civil War." For the three years the series ran, Century's circulation soared to over 250,000—three times the former level. The popularity of U.S. Grant's Memoirs, published in 1885, was also enormous, in part because the Union commander adopted in his recollections a consistently magnanimous attitude toward his former Confederate foes. Soon a new war would unite North and South, where the old war had divided them.[2]

The statesmen of earlier years, the bearded James G. Blaines, Roscoe Conklings, and Oliver Mortons, about whom I have spoken often, began to seem archaic and alien when contrasted to the new men with new methods like Bryan, Roosevelt, Robert La Follette and Arthur Gorman. The issues that had preoccupied the post-war generation—reconstruction, public lands, railroads—were also beginning to seem faded and old fashioned. As the century waned, the problems confronting the Nation seemed as new and different as the new men called upon to grapple with them. The problems pushing so urgently to the fore were economic and social, immune to the old, familiar political resolutions. New issues like reform and expansion jostled alongside persistent old issues, but the old orthodoxies were mute when solutions were needed.

Historian Harold Faulkner offers a vivid description of the perplexing problems with which the nation seemed suddenly confronted in these years:

The late eighties had brought hard times to the farmer, the workingman, and to many businessmen as well, and with hard times doubts and disillusionment; in the nineties came open revolt, a challenge to old beliefs, a repudiation of old shibboleths, a fragmentation of old parties. There was almost everywhere a feeling that somehow the promise of American life was not being fulfilled. . . . The continent had been conquered, and the frontier was no more, but the cost of exploitation and waste was a sobering one. Industry flourished, and the new Nation was rapidly forging ahead of her Old World competitors, but at the price of recreating those class conflicts from which the United States had heretofore been thought immune. Cities had grown and flourished, but with them slums and poverty, crime and vice. . . . In 1890, Americans were reading Jacob Riis' How the Other Half Lives; they had not supposed that there was, in America, an "Other Half," except among the Negroes. The ruthless exploitation of natural resources made the Nation rich beyond the imaginings of its founders, but the riches were gravitating into the hands of the few, and the power of wealth in politics caused the gravest misgivings. . . . Democracy flourished, and with it corruption.[3]

These conditions might have led to revolt, as, indeed, they have in other countries. But, and I believe this is a testament to the flexibility of our system of government as established by the Constitution, instead, they led gradually to reform. While much of that reform took place on the local and State level, some of the issues agitating public life were fought out on the national stage in Congress.

Today, in dealing with the first half of this tumultuous era, I intend to underscore the Senate's role in these issues—how it solved, ignored, or exacerbated these problems. While many of these years were practically devoid of significant legislation, the calendars of others were crammed full of momentous measures which continue to affect us today. Old questions like the tariff nagged and were dealt with by the Mills tariff and the McKinley tariff; despite efforts to suppress it, the continuing problem of black voting rights in the South came to the fore with the "Force Bill"; the question of silver plagued these Congresses as it had previous ones and was dealt with, at least temporarily, by the Sherman Silver Purchase Act; well-meaning reformers tried to ameliorate the conditions of the Indians with the Dawes Act; other major reforms were embodied in the Interstate Commerce Act and the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Just discussing these major pieces of legislation will more than amply make a lengthy talk, so I shall save until my next address discussion of the internal changes taking place in the Senate and the colorful personalities who filled these same seats before us. The internal reforms in the Senate and the reform legislation passed by the Senate are pieces of the same cloth. Historian Robert Wiebe has characterized these years as ones in which America was consumed by the "search for order," and we shall follow the Senate on this search in both this address and the next.

We left the Senate, at the end of my last address, in the hot summer of 1884, on the eve of the presidential nominating conventions. The elections of 1882 had given the Democrats a large majority in the House. The Republicans held onto the Senate by just four seats. Republican Chester A. Arthur, the accidental President, sat uneasily in the White House, doubting that his party would offer him the nomination. Nearly everyone agreed that Arthur had been a better president than expected, but his positive accomplishments had been negligible.

Mounting tariffs, rising prices, and a minor depression in 1882-1884 were sorely trying the patience of the electorate. Disgruntlement with Republican rule was widespread. Republicans knew as well as Democrats that if the Democrats could produce a reasonable Presidential candidate in 1884, they might well capture all the citadels of power—the Presidency, the House, and the Senate—for the first time in over a quarter century. The prospect made for cautious euphoria in Democratic circles and gloom in Republican ones.

As in previous election years, many senators were in positions to be "king makers," or, in our democracy, "president makers," and some were long shots for the top position itself. The Republicans met first that summer in Chicago. Early it became clear that James G. Blaine, the former senator from Maine, whom I have mentioned often, was the favorite. Blaine, however, remained aloof, and busied himself with his memoirs, which, I might add, shed light on important years in the Senate's history. Despite his protests, Blaine was the most popular Republican in the country. More important, with Roscoe Conkling ignominously retired from the Senate, most Republicans believed that Blaine was the man who would represent their interests better than anyone else.

On the first ballot, Blaine got over 300 votes; Arthur, 278. Minor candidates, controlling over 200 votes, split into roughly two groups: the civil service reformers who voted for Senator George Edmunds of Vermont, whom scandal had never touched, and the mid-west professionals, chiefly the followers of Senators John Sherman of Ohio and John A. Logan of Illinois. The reformers, led by Carl Schurz, former Missouri senator and Secretary of the Interior in the Hayes administration, were known as the Mugwumps—fencesitters, with their mugs on one side, and their wumps on the other.[4]

On the fourth ballot, the midwesterners swung to Blaine, giving him the nomination. The Republican campaign would be managed by a powerful group of current and future senators: Don Cameron of Pennsylvania and John Logan, then sitting in the chamber, and Stephen Elkins of West Virginia and William "Machiavelli" Chandler of New Hampshire, soon to join them.

The Democrats, also meeting in Chicago, had no outstanding leader but every prospect for winning the presidency. On the second ballot, the nomination went to Governor Grover Cleveland of New York, who just four years before had been an unknown Buffalo lawyer. His term in Albany had earned him a reputation for honesty and courage, and he was an advocate of civil service reform, assets Democrats knew would help lure away disaffected Mugwumps. Though Senator William Barnum of Connecticut was titular chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the directing genius behind Cleveland's campaign was freshman Senator Arthur P. Gorman, the "boss" of Maryland, just beginning his twenty-year reign over the Senate's Democrats.[5]

The contest between Blaine and Cleveland was dirty and close. When the votes were tallied, Cleveland emerged the victor. Actually, compared to the Democratic sweep in 1882, the Republicans hadn't done so badly. They gained 22 seats in the House, though still not enough to regain the majority, and picked up one seat in the Senate, making their slim majority here more solid. The Democrats, however, had won the presidency, making Cleveland the first Democratic President in a quarter century.

At the outset, Cleveland was regarded by civil service reformers as one of their own. He had announced that he would not only faithfully execute the Pendleton law (which I discussed in my last address), but would refrain from dismissing any officeholders unprotected by it unless they had proved themselves "offensive partisans." During the nine months prior to the meeting of the 49th Congress, he discovered 643 of the latter among the officeholders appointed by his predecessors, and proceeded to suspend them.[6]

Reformers deemed this number excessive. Carl Schurz wrote frankly to the president: "Your attempt to please both reformers and spoilsmen has failed. I warned you more than once that your principal danger was to sit down between two chairs." The Republican Senate, with less worthy motives, emulated Schurz' indignation. It requested the president to give specific reasons for each of the 643 suspensions. Cleveland refused to gratify their request, citing the political practice of half a century. The contest dragged on so long that the terms of many of the suspended officials expired, and Cleveland was able to win a practical victory by simply withdrawing the names of his appointees and then resubmitting the same names as those of nominees to now vacant offices.[7]

The only constructive measure on which the Democratic House and the Republican Senate could agree during the first session of the 49th Congress was a bill introduced by Senator George Frisbie Hoar of Massachusetts to change the order of presidential succession. The Constitution provided that Congress should decide who was to succeed to the presidency in the event that both the president and vice president died, resigned, or became disabled. In 1792, Congress provided for succession, after the vice president, of the president pro tempore of the Senate, then of the speaker of the House. This was, in turn, altered by Senator Hoar's proposal, the Presidential Succession Act of 1886, which changed the line of succession to run from the vice president to the secretary of state, secretary of treasury, and so on through the cabinet in order of rank.

Senator Hoar argued persuasively that for much of a president's term, Congress was not convened and thus had no officers. He reminded his colleagues of the nine month gap that had just intervened between Cleveland's March inauguration and the 49th Congress' first meeting. At the time of Garfield's assassination, an event then still vivid in every senator's mind, Congress had not convened and did not for six more months. Even as Hoar argued, the nation was without a vice president and remained so throughout the 49th and 50th Congress. Vice President Thomas Hendricks, formerly a Senator from Indiana, had died on November 25, 1885. What if, Hoar asked, President Cleveland had died on November 26, when there was no vice president, no president pro tempore, and no speaker? [8]

Another vexing problem with the 1792 line of secession had been clear to the senators since 1881, when the Democrats controlled the Senate but the Republicans held the presidency, creating a situation where the president pro tempore, and hence the potential acting president, was not of the same party as the chief executive. Even as the senators debated, Democrat Cleveland sat in the White House, while Republican John Sherman presided over the Senate.

With many compelling arguments to recommend it, Hoar's bill passed the Senate and House without serious opposition and was signed by the president on January 19, 1886.

This was the line of succession which I studied in elementary school and in high school, and it remained established and unchanged until 1947, when a new act, still in force today, placed the Speaker and then the President pro tempore next in line to the Vice President.

With the exception of Hoar's bill, little of importance transpired during the first session of the 49th Congress. So-called "pork barrel legislation,"—you understand they knew all about that back in those days too—totaling nearly $15 million consumed much of the session, with Republicans and Democrats harmoniously supporting each other's pet projects.

Things really have not changed a lot, have they? The only thing is, a lot of people forget that this has been going on a long time. They assign it to this generation only, apparently.

An exception was thirty-year-old freshman Republican Representative Robert M. LaFollette of Wisconsin. Congressmen listened in amazement to a speech against the pork barrel by the audacious young man from Wisconsin, a State supposed to be safely controlled by the powerful machine run by Senators John C. Spooner and Philetus Sawyer. Sawyer, a millionaire ex-lumberjack, was said to be so illiterate that he signed himself "P. Sawyer" because he could not spell "Philetus," but so powerful that, as La Follette said, he bought men "as he bought saw-logs." [9]

Perhaps I should take a moment to look at the derivation of the term "pork barrel," because it was at this time in the Senate's history that it came into general use and also general disrepute. The "pork barrel" is the state of national treasury, into which government officials dip for "pork" or funds for local projects. The phrase probably is derived from the pre-Civil War practice of periodically distributing salt pork to the slaves from huge barrels. A 1919 article in the National Municipal Review described the term's origin:

> Oftentimes the eagerness of the slaves would result in a rush upon the pork barrel, in which each would strive to grab as much as possible for himself. Members of Congress, in the stampede to get their local appropriation items into the omnibus river and harbor bills, behaved so much like Negro slaves rushing the pork barrel that these bills were facetiously styled "pork barrel" bills . . . [10]

In the late nineteenth century, the classic example of pork barrel legislation was a river and harbor bill, a piece of legislation that provided morsels for scores of congressmen in the form of appropriations for dams and piers, highways and bridges.

Another matter on which the Republican and Democratic senators saw eye to eye was the awarding of pensions to Civil War veterans. Soldiers actually disabled in the war and the widows of those slain had long since been provided for. But the northern veterans' organization, the Grand Army of the Republic, had developed into a very formidable pressure group. Allied with the Grand Army was a younger army of attorneys who derived their chief income from pension cases, many of which were patently fraudulent. Mainly at the instigation of the latter, more than one hundred private pension bills, most of which had already been rejected by the pension commissioner, were passed in just the first session of the 49th Congress. The stamina to resist such applications, backed as they were by such a powerful lobblying group, while lacking in either branch of Congress, was found in the president, who vetoed every one of the bills.[11]

The second session of the 49th Congress, which convened in December 1886, was much more fruitful than the first. The most important fruit it bore, though more for setting precedent than immediate remedy, was the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act. For years, Grange organizations of farmers in the midwest has been agitating against discriminatory rates and other railroad abuses. Elsewhere there was resentment against rebates, unfair variations in rates, and a host of monopolistic practices by the lines. From time to time Congress had held hearings that aired the public dissatisfaction, and members of both houses had introduced regulatory bills. But the railroad lobby, distributing passes, bribes, and other favors, had always been too strong and none of these measures had passed. In the mid-1880's, however, powerful industrialists began to join those complaining about the railroads' monopolistic practices, and their voices carried far more weight than those of the farmers.[12]

In March 1885, at the urging of Republican Shelby Cullom of Illinois, the Senate established a select committee to investigate rail abuses. Its members were Senators Cullom, Warner Miller of New York, and Orville Platt of Connecticut, Repubicans; and Isham Harris of Tennessee and Arthur Gorman, Democrats. The five spent a large part of the summer recess taking testimony in most of the major rail centers of the nation, from Boston to Omaha and from Minneapolis to New Orleans.

At first railroad officials paid little attention to the investigation, but when it became clear that Cullom and his colleagues were determined to bring the railroads under federal control their aloofness changed to keen interest. When, in 1886, the Supreme Court ruled that states could not regulate railroads that crossed state lines, the hitherto inaccessible magnates rushed to Washington, complaining that they have not been afforded the opportunity to present their arguments, and, of course, hoping to forestall any legislative action.[13]

Rail executives had reason for concern. The select committee drafted a bill that it hoped would correct the abuses its members had found, and Senator Cullom introduced the measure in December 1885. It quickly ran into opposition from Republican Senator Nelson Aldrich of Rhode Island. In the ensuing debates, Aldrich established himself as Congress' leading representative of finance capitalism. The bill, he argued, was tantamount to "revolution"; it would cripple both internal and external commerce. Though Cullom himself recollected that the bill was "conservative legislation," Aldrich tried hard to convince his colleagues and the people that it was dangerously radical. Despite vigorous opposition, Cullom's bill passed the Senate on May 12, 1886.[14]

Meanwhile, the House had passed a railroad regulation bill introduced by John Reagan, a Texas Democrat. The measure differed substantially from the Cullom bill in that it did not provide a commission to enforce the regulatory measures include in the proposed legislation. Since the Senate conferees insisted upon the commission and the House conferees would not budge, a deadlock ensued which remained unbroken at adjournment. By the following January, both sides were in a more conciliatory mood; a revised bill was hammered out and carried back to the respective chambers.

By that time, thanks to the industriousness of the railroads and their lobbyists, enthusiasm for the measure had begun to evaporate in the Senate. Exasperated, Cullom professed he was "greatly provoked, almost outraged, at the manner in which senators opposed the adoption of the conference report." Democrat John Tyler Morgan of Alabama, and Republicans William Evarts of New York and George Hoar joined Aldrich in attacking specific clauses of the measure and opposing regulation in general.[15]

Forces in favor of regulation overcame the opposition, and on February 4, 1887, the Interstate Commerce Act finally passed and received the president's signature. The first important act in American history regulating interstate commerce thus became law. The act prohibited most of the objectionable railroad practices and created the Interstate Commerce Commission to oversee the enforcement of the act's provisions. For years the railroads' many devices to circumvent the provisions rendered the commission all but powerless. But, in the wave of reforms during the twentieth century, other congressional acts strengthened the commission's authority over all carriers of interstate commerce, and as the federal government's first regulatory body—able to act independently of the three branches of government but combining the functions of all of them—it served as a model for such future administrative agencies as the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission.[16]

With the Interstate Commerce Act, Congress hoped to end the widespread railroad abuses. Another measure, passed early in 1877 as the 49th Congress was winding down, attempted to solve another persistent problem—the status of Indians in the West.

By the late 1880s, the Indians were a mere remnant of one quarter million. Dispossessed of most of their lands and pacified by military force, most had been herded onto reservations west of the Mississippi. They were wards of the government, supported largely by its grudging bounty. In 1871, responding to the pressure of the railroads and other interests that wanted the Indian's land, the spoilsmen in Congress ended treaty making and the recognition of tribes as independent political entities. Thereafter aggrandizers, encouraged by congressional leaders such as Conkling, Blaine, and Garfield, and supported by troops and corrupt government agents, seized what they wanted, their aggressions leading to such desperate last stands of Indian resistance as the dramatic battle of the Little Bighorn in 1876.

By 1887, it was widely known that Indian affairs were inefficiently managed and the system riddled with abuses. The demand for reform coming from well-intentioned humanitarians was growing stronger daily. To remedy the situation, the House and Senate passed a bill known as the General Allotment Act, or the Dawes Severalty Act, after Senator Henry L. Dawes of Massachusetts, its sponsor. The Dawes Act empowered the president to divide a reservation and allot to each head of a family 160 acres, with lesser amounts to bachelors, women, and children. What land was left over (and it was expected to be thousands of acres) would revert to the public domain. The Dawes Act was the first systematic effort to provide for Indian welfare and marked a revolution in the handling of Indian affairs. Unfortunately, it proved a disaster.

The purpose of the Dawes Act, in the eyes of well-meaning but misguided reformers, of whom Dawes was one, was to break up the tribal system and make the Indian a self-supporting citizen according to the white man's values. Many who supported the act, however, were land greedy, and had in mind the acres and acres of land that would be open for settlement rather than the Indian's welfare.

For the Indians, the Dawes Act was a failure. Never consulted by the reformers, the Indians were unable or unwilling to change their way of life. It was wholly unrealistic to expect a people to abandon centuries-old traditions and embrace the acquisitive society of the white man based on private ownership of land. Furthermore, the land reserved for the Indians was often barely adequate to sustain a decent living. Modification of the Dawes Act during the 1890's brought little relief. Far from assimilating the Indians, the Dawes Act made poverty a fixture on the reservations, robbing the tribes of water rights, timber, and much of the land needed for viable economies. It was not until the administration of Franklin Roosevelt in 1934—the year I graduated from high school—that the allotment plan was discarded and efforts were made to save the last vestiges of the Indians' cultural traditions.[17]

The 49th Congress adjourned on March 1, 1887, just days after passing the Dawes Act. The election returns of the previous November weighed heavily on the minds of the Democrats returning to their constituents, but revived the moral of their Republican colleagues. The Democratic margin in the House had been substantially reduced from 42 to 18. With the 1888 presidential elections on the horizon, Democratic congressional leaders warned Cleveland that it was time to attempt some bold stroke to capture the public's lagging interest. Though still a minority, Senate Democrats had gained three seats, making the division 37–39 rather than 34–41.

The president took his congressional advisors up on their suggestion, but looked in a direction they had not foreseen. Cleveland turned to the steadily increasing treasury surplus. The nation's rigid system of budget and taxation had amassed a surplus of $150 million in gold, much of it owing to the heavy receipts from the protective tariff of 1883. This incredible surplus, labeled the "Treasury Octopus" by its enemies, was, in fact, becoming an acute embarrassment as agitation spread among hard-pressed farmers against "bloated bond holders" and the "Shylocks" of Wall Street.

Republicans favored spending the surplus on pensions, public works, harbor improvements, and fortifications. But Cleveland was unwilling to see federal revenues doled out to undeserving pensioners or invested in public works projects he believed unnecessary. He sought ways to diminish the ponderous surplus by reducing taxes and tariff rates on imports. Moreover, tariff cuts could be defended as helpful to consumers and as a means of preventing monopoly. Mugwumps, middle-western farmers, and powerful railroad interests were on his side. Cleveland decided to make the tariff his "Live Issue."

Cleveland's own party's canvassing experts warned him to "go slow." With the Senate in Republican hands and the thin Democratic majority in the House divided on the question, his chances of obtaining a satisfactory bill in an election year seemed slim. William Whitney, his secretary of the Navy, urges that "it was not the right time to push it." But Cleveland, with an honesty that reflected the best side of his nature, replied, "What is the use of being elected or reelected if you don't stand for something?" [18]

The 50th Congress, convening in December 1887 and lasting until March 1889, came to be regarded as the most "do-nothing" Congress of all. While it ended in a whimper, however, it started off with a bang. Readers of Puck among the members of the 50th Congress were greeted by a wonderfully vivid Keppler cartoon. In it, an enormously bloated, leering dragon is spreading himself out over the Senate chamber. Senators are dashing for the doors, climbing over chairs, cowering under desks, anything to get away from this dread beast labeled "The Surplus." There was, in real life, no escape from the persistent problem of the bloated surplus, as the senators and representatives were to find out on December 6, when the president sent to the Hill his annual message which he devoted entirely to the tariff question.[19]

Cleveland used harsh words to condemn the "iniquitous system." The tariff was, he claimed, "a burden upon those with moderate means and the poor, the employed and unemployed, the sick and well, and the young and old . . . a tax which with relentless grasp is fastened upon the clothing of every man, woman and child in the land." Alarmed protectionists immediately attacked him. "The Democratic party in power is a standing menace to the industrial prosperity of the country," announced Blaine, who, though out of Congress, was still influential as the elder stateman of the Republicans.[20]

Rational tariff legislation could only be obtained if Congress would subordinate sectional and corporate interests to the general needs of the nation, not a likely occurrence in an election year. In April 1888, a new reduced tariff bill named for Roger Q. Mills of Texas, the short-tempered Democratic chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, was introduced in the House. Debate dragged on through July, long after the national conventions.

In the Senate, which they controlled, the Republicans, not surprisingly, rejected the Mills bill and decided to write their own version of a tariff revision, dubbed the "Senate Substitute," with no little aid from the iron and textile lobbies. Drawn up principally by Aldrich and William Boyd Allison from Iowa of the Finance Committee, the Republican's protectionist bill lowered only the tariff on sugar (which would cost them votes only in solidly Democratic Louisiana). The senators heard learned disquisitions on nails, birdcages, and sulphur designed, as Senator Cullom noted, for "home consumption," until October 20, when the Senate adjourned without voting on the bill.[21]

Other than the tariff, the chief interests of the session were subsidy and public works bills. Again they drew scorn from the fiery La Follette, now serving his second term in the House, having won reelection over the strident opposition of the Wisconsin machine headed by Senators Sawyer and John C. Spooner. On one occasion, as La Follette flailed away at appropriations desired by the machine, Sawyer came charging apoplectically onto the House floor, storming at La Follette, "Young man, young man, what are you doing? You are a bolter, sir, a bolter." La Follette held his ground, replying that the senator could not tell him how to vote, and Sawyer, realizing that he was violating congressional etiquette and House rules, vanished as abruptly as he had appeared.[22]

At the Democratic National Convention in St. Louis in 1888, Cleveland was unanimously renominated. The Republicans, meeting in Chicago, were much divided. Once again, Blaine could have had the nomination, but again he professed disinterest. For the tariff battle, the party needed a midwesterner and many eyes, including Blaine's, turned to Benjamin Harrison, grandson of former president William Henry Harrison, who had just completed one undistinguished term in the Senate.

A warm personality was not among the Hoosier senator's political assets. A political ally once arranged a speaking engagement for him, then cautiously urged him to "warm up" with the crowd: "for God's sake be a human being down there. Mix around a little with the boys after the meeting." After the meeting, Harrison confessed failure. "I tried it, but I failed. I'll never try it again. I must be myself." Despite Harrison's aloofness, his friends were quietly building a boom behind his name.[23]

Senator John Sherman badly wanted the nomination but took his usual lofty ground: "If it/the nomination/ comes, I will accept it as a duty and it if goes to someone more worthy, I will not be a mugwump/defector/." Sherman seemed to have a good chance; he was from a strategically located state, and had a national reputation on the tariff question. But he had not shaken the "Ohio Icicle" image of earlier years.[24]

There were other, darker horses, in contention. Among them, Senator William Allison of Iowa; Chauncey Depew, future senator from New York but then president of the New York Central Railroad, a position which made him unacceptable to the West; and Michigan's "millionaire governor" Russell Alger, also a future senator. Managing behind the scenes was a bevy of current and future senators which included Senator Matthew Quay, the premier "boss" of Pennsylvania; former and future New York Senator Thomas Platt, "the easy boss"; and future Ohio Senator Mark Hanna. After much maneuvering, on the fifth ballot, the tide turned to Harrison; he could carry the doubtful states, he was Blaine's heir, and he had wider appeal than any of the other local favorites.

In November, voters were called upon to decide whether, as the Republican platform claimed, Democrats were animated by a desire to destroy "the general business, the labor and the farming interests of the country." By a small popular majority of 94,000 votes in Cleveland's favor, the people seemed to answer that they did not believe this to be the case. But when the electoral votes were counted, Harrison received 233 to Cleveland's 168. Not only did the Republicans regain the White House, but they captured the House once again. When the 51st Congress convened in December, the Republicans controlled the Congress and the presidency.[25]

In their moment of exhilarating victory, the Republicans had dangerous internal problems, illustrated by confrontations between Senator Quay and the new president. Quay expected the president-elect's "fervent and grateful congratulations." Instead, Harrison calmly remarked that "Providence has given us the victory." Quay snorted to friends, "Providence hadn't a damned thing to do with it. Harrison would never learn how close a number of men were compelled to approach the gates of the penitentiary to make him president, where he could return thanks to the Almighty for his promotion." [26]

The "lame duck" session of the 50th Congress held after the Republican victory was as barren of constructive legislation as the first. A hasty attempt to modify the tariff was defeated by Republicans eager to wait until the next Congress when they would hold all the reins. North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington were about to be admitted as states. This would boost the size of the Union to 42 states; increasing the Senate to 84 members; the House, after the census of 1890, to 357; and making the voice of the West in the councils of power far stronger. Also during this lame duck session, the Department of Agriculture was elevated to cabinet level. On March 3, 1889, the 50th Congress closed its books for good, and the next day, the Republicans reclaimed the seats of power.

The 51st Congress, convening on December 2, 1889, proved to be as dramatic as the 50th had been lackluster. Important changes in procedure as well as milestone legislation such as the Sherman Antitrust Act awaited in the wings. The changes began in the House, where the session got off with a tremendous bang. I would like to look a bit at the action in the House at this point because it mirrored a new mood for change afoot in the Senate.

During the lame duck session just passed, business in the House had been frustrated by endless roll calls and filibusters. These dilatory tactics dismayed responsible legislators, notably Thomas Reed of Maine and Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts. A Republican reformer, Lodge could hardly contain himself over the lowly state into which the House had fallen. Drastic revisions of the rules were needed, he said to "change the condition of the House from dead rot to vitality."[27]

These calls for reform were echoed by Reed, who had been minority leader and was now chief candidate to become the Republican speaker in the 51st Congress. Reed was one of the most engaging figures in congressional lore—charming, genial, a master of epigrams and bon mots. His wit was rapier sharp and his impalements of colleagues were legion. Of two representatives he commented, "They never open up their mouths without subtracting from the sum of human knowledge." Reed literally loomed over House proceedings, filling a chair with nearly 300 pounds, standing in debate at 6 feet, 3 inches, in size 12 shoes.[28]

With the help of Lodge and other New Englanders, when the House convened on December 2, 1889, Reed was elected speaker. Reed, handsome William McKinley of Ohio, and Joseph Cannon of Illinois, known as "foulmouthed Joe," constituted a majority of the Rules Committee, and they immediately set out to draft new rules for the new session. Reed's principal goal was to end the precedent—observed since the 1st Congress—of establishing quorums by a count of those who voted, rather than those who were actually present. With the House so evenly divided and the Democrats remaining silent for any roll call on a subject of which they disapproved, the Republicans would be hard put to get a quorum at any time during the session.

On January 29, 1890, the House began to consider contested elections. When the first one was reported, awarding a disputed seat to a Republican, a Democrat moved for consideration. When the roll was called no Democrat answered to his name, and the vote—even with all 163 Republicans voting—was short of a quorum. Reed, however, was ready. Having assured himself of the constitutionality of what he was about to do, he calmly said, "The chair directs the clerk to record the names of the following members present and refusing to vote." He then began to call out the names of every Democrat he could spy. After a moment of incredulity, the hall exploded in an uproar. Democrats leaped to their feet, shouting for the count to stop, but Reed continued to call the names while Republicans applauded, whistled, and cheered. Reed's ruling that a quorum was present produced another tumult that lasted for three days.[29]

Again and again furious Democrats demanded roll calls and each time the imperturbable "Czar" Reed read off the names of those present but not voting. After one climatic scene in which Reed ordered the doors of the chamber locked to prevent Democrats from excaping (enraged Democrats hid under desks, behind screens, and anywhere they could find to keep from being counted), enough Republicans showed up to constitute a quorum on their own—two were brought in on sickbeds—and Reed's rules were approved.

The House, thanks to Reed, could now conduct its business efficiently. In the next Congress, which the Democrats overwhelmingly controlled, Reed's changes were abandoned, but in the Congress after that the Democrats, with a slimmer majority, saw the wisdom of his rulings, readopted them, and they became permanent. The new rules meant that party responsibility in the House had begun.

Mr. President, I mention these dramatic events in the House at length because much the same type of revolution in party control, a tightening, was brewing in the Senate. While it did not reach full flower for a few more years, until the period I will cover in my next talk, I think it is important to note that these activities had already begun in the House.

To a large extent, Reed's revolution in 1890 was motivated by the Republicans' determination—while they occupied the White House and possessed majorities in both houses—to push through legislation, particularly a higher tariff. In his first message to Congress, Harrison took up the issue that had dominated much of the campaign and urged a reversal of Cleveland's tariff policy.

McKinley handled the measure in the House. He hoped to counteract the higher rates many powerful Republicans espoused with a nationally oriented measure, extending protectionism's favors to the West and South, and to the farmer in general. He held hearings that produced a fat volume of testimony and, each night, spread his papers out on the floor of his cramped hotel room to get a view of the whole task. His planning produced the usual rate increases, though few were as important or as high as critics making political capital charged. Whatever the bill's merits, however, they were lost in a flood of abuse and misrepresentation when McKinley reported the measure on April 16. At length, House Democrats decided to let the bill pass and use it to their advantage in the upcoming fall elections. They sent the bill on to the Senate in May.[30]

Tariff struggles were hardly new to ranking senators, but every revenue measure taxed the patience and parliamentary skill of leaders in both parties. Like the silver question, with which the tariff became inextricably entwined, the tariff was a magic rock that gushed oratory and dissension for every man who struck it. "The contest over a revision of the tariff brings to light a selfish strife which is not far from disgusting," Senator John Spooner complained. McKinley's bill went to the Senate Finance Committee, where Vermont's venerable Justin Smith Morrill presided. Some of the nation's landmark legislation bore his name, and he was a fierce protectionist; but Morrill was 80 years old, and he passed formal management on to Allison. The tactful Iowan had helped form the "Senate Substitute" that scuttled the Mills bill a few years earlier, but now asked the chairman to let Rhode Island's Nelson Aldrich take the McKinley bill in hand. Aldrich had only entered the Senate in 1881, but was already a ranking member of its inner circle and a formidable expert on revenue measures. He was self-made, successful in business and politics. Suave, elegant in attire and manners, Aldrich avoided "the farce of mixing in mock debates." He liked to pay debts with terrapin suppers and made deals while sailing.[31]

Aldrich's first major problem in handling the McKinley tariff was James G. Blaine, now secretary of state, and a tariff expert, who insisted on explaining the principles of reciprocity to a skeptical Finance Committee. He arrived one June day, hat in hand, and properly calm. The senators endured his lecture, but cooly declined to engage in discussion. They were not about to let the president usurp their prerogatives. As Blaine rose to go he warned, "Pass this bill, and in 1892 there will not be a man in all the party so beggared as to accept your nomination for the presidency." [32]

While Blaine worked for reciprocity behind the scenes, the Senate opened the tariff debate on July 7, and the measure's nearly 500 amendments promised an endless struggle. Complications with free silver and the election bill, which I shall mention shortly, made Aldrich predict a working Christmas. The windy silverites, filling pages with dull speeches on the gold conspiracy and the virtues of currency inflation, were the chief problem. They knew that they held the votes needed for the tariff. One of their number, William Stewart of Nevada, eager for high rates on wool, hides, ore, and lumber, praised the tariff extravagantly, but warned, "there will be no tariff legislation this session unless a silver bill is passed." [33]

Aldrich considered invoking cloture but realized that he was outnumbered by those opposed to changing the sacred rules of free debate. He fell ill, no doubt of disgust, and Allison managed the bill after all, while rates climbed amid the rolling of political logs. The hot summer wore on as the Senate endured discourses on nails, sulphur, and alcohol. The fruitless debate angered businessmen, irritated the public, and played into Democratic hands. "Mills continue to fail and the Senate does about as much in a week as a set of men in business would do in half an hour," a correspondent angrily warned Senator Sherman. "You are killing the Republican party as fast as you can." Another was equally candid: "Just look at the Senate, please. There it sits, day after day, like a great big nincompoop or a knot on a log, unable to move or do anything." [34]

The knot finally loosened in September when a conference committee settled details between the House and Senate versions. Inevitably, Sherman was involved, much to his disgust. "I have been hard at work for a week or more on this tariff conference committee," he wrote a friend. "I trust I will not live long enough to have any connection with another." Harrison signed the bill on October 1, and weary congressmen dispersed to campaign. The law satisfied most Republicans, but the Democrats, already publicizing each upward revision with the cry of "high tariff means high prices" predicted a GOP debacle.[35]

As I mentioned, the tariff's passage was only procured after two other major issues had been dealt with: elections in the South and silver. Harrison's discussion of the tariff in 1888 did not excite southerners nearly as much as his frequent allusions to "a free ballot," which forecast Republican interest in another effort to help blacks. Harrison emphasized the subject in his inaugural address and in his message to Congress in December 1889. He and other influential Republicans were angered at open southern defiance of the Constitution in suppressing and coercing black voters. Violence at the polls in 1888 and 1889 stiffened their resolve. A strong streak of political practicality also strengthened their determination. Republicans knew that ballots of black voters would add enough southern House seats to end their minority status, especially if industrialism and the appeals of tariff protection increased. The cries of lonely Republican outposts in the South stirred their northern brethren. "To be a Republican in active politics in the South is to be a foolish martyr," a Georgian wrote Senator Sherman.[36]

In December 1889, Senators Hoar of Massachusetts and Spooner of Wisconsin canvassed colleagues and drafted an elections bill which they introduced in April. But they passed leadership on it to the House, where Lodge wished to originate the measure from his special committee on elections. While Lodge seemed a strange leader for such a crusade, with his social connections and Puritan lineage, he proved effective. He avoided any serious prospect of military rule in the bill, relying on legal remedies rather than penalties or federal force, but still the bill, dubbed the "Force Bill" by opponents, was predictably despised by southerners and Democrats. City machine bosses also did not welcome the thought of federal inspectors in their wards. Mugwumps suspected popular suffrage. Labor leaders feared possible use of troops. Despite this array of opponents, Lodge shepherded the bill through the House on July 2.

In the Senate, Democrats, led by Gorman of Maryland, made good their threats to tie the measure up in filibusters, which also meant the floundering of the tariff bill. After days and days of delay, Mathew Quay of Pennsylvania led the way out of the confusion. After heated caucus debates, he persuaded his colleagues to pass over the "Force Bill" until the short session in December. Spooner condemned "the almighty dollar" that put tariffs above civil rights, but Hoar secured pledges from other Republicans to consider the bill later. "It will probably give us a tariff bill," said Senator Orville Platt of Connecticut, "but acquired at what a sacrifice!" [37]

True to their word, the Republicans brought the "Force Bill" back for consideration in December of 1890. But Nevada's silver-haired silverite, William Stewart, took time from analyzing an alleged international gold conspiracy to kill it. Southern family ties fortified his dislike of federal interference in state affairs, so he kept western senators available, and watched the calendar for his chance. On January 5, 1891, before a friendly presiding officer, Steward moved to displace the Lodge bill with a free coinage measure. The silver Republicans sustained him, and at month's end, western senators defeated a final attempt to save the bill.[38]

Spooner was outraged. "I am too angry to write. . . . We are fallen upon bad times for the party. The Confederacy and the western mining camps are in legislative supremacy. Think of it—Nevada, barely a respectable county, furnished two senators to betray the Republican party and the rights of the citizenship for silver. . . . We are punished for making too easy the pathway of rotten boroughs into the Union." One of Sherman's correspondents saw the debacle's real significance: "This is but another sign that the inevitable is coming, and that the people are more interested in money matters than in election bills." [39]

Stewart's free coinage issue tied the Senate in even more knots than had the election bill. A renewed economic depression and a steady drop in the price of silver had strengthened the agitation of the inflationists. A proposed program for the government's increased purchase of silver had been sent to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury and passed, but the Senate silverites were not quite satisfied. Silver's champions held the balance of power in the upper house, and were prepared to scuttle any measure, as they had the election bill, to prove their strength.

The movement for free coinage of silver was more than an effort by "Bonanza Kings," as the senators from the west were called, to raise the price of the metal they mined. It was far more widespread, embracing farmers, whose income was dwindling, and others feeling displaced by increasing industrialization. There was no easy political solution, but silverites were determined to keep the Senate in session until a measure, good or ill, that they favored was passed. Congressional tempers mounted and public patience grew thin. But it was clear that silver was the key—no other bill could pass the Senate before its adherents were satisfied. Powerful men attended quiet conferences, leaving the floor to those who liked debate. Sherman, Allison, Aldrich, and Platt all preferred reason and persuasion. The silverites were holding the tariff hostage and they were determined to liberate it. Sherman recalled the words of Mark Hanna, a powerful Ohio Republican: "Pass the McKinley tariff and a conservative silver bill and we are all right this fall."

The resulting Sherman Act required the treasury to buy 4 million ounces of silver a month—the estimated American production—at market value. Treasury notes issued in payment were redeemable "in coin." The law did not threaten the gold standard for the moment, but laid up future trouble with the word "coin." Most silverites accepted the compromise. As Senator Henry Teller of Colorado said, they would take "the next best thing" to free coinage. When the news reached Stewart, he cried, "Good! and good will be the verdict of the country." [40]

You might think that, with the Sherman Silver Bill, the Force Bill, and the tariff debates, the Congress had done more than enough for one session and could go home. But such was not the case. Exhausted senators still had to face an antitrust crusade before they rested.

Throughout the country, public indignation had been growing against the monopolistic power of industry, stemming from the development, under finance capitalism, of pools, holding companies, and trusts that controlled various commodities. Many states had tried to cope with the trusts, but their laws were generally powerless since they could not deal with combinations engaged in interstate commerce.

When Congress convened that winter of 1889, antitrust bills filled the hoppers, with "plenty more in the brains of statesmen seeking popularity." Sherman offered his own first draft to the Senate on December 4. After he wrangled with George Edmunds of Vermont over proper assignment, the measure passed through the Judiciary Committee and under many pencils before facing debate. The final bill declared illegal every "contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . ." and prescribed punishment.[41]

Harrison signed the measure on June 26, after full congressional debate and newspaper coverage. Its obscure wording impaired its initial effectiveness. And for years, it was used more often against labor unions than industry—quite to the contrary of Sherman's intentions. While it was eventually superseded by new legislation, the Sherman Antitrust Act represented a sincere effort by the Republicans to come to terms with industrial combination.

The 51st Congress was dubbed the "Billion Dollar Congress," slightly more than that sum having been appropriated for pensions, subsidies, and "pork barrel" bills. House Speaker Reed dismissed the criticism of appalled citizens with the explanation that "this is a billion-dollar country," but that fall, the Republicans—despite their unusually productive record—suffered a stunning defeat in the congressional elections. While the Senate remained in the Republican column, the GOP lost nearly 100 seats in the House, putting it in Democratic hands. The McKinley tariff, the heavy spending, and the agitation for the Federal Election Bill were all blamed.

The division between the two houses in the 52nd Congress during Harrison's last two years in office resulted in the passage of little significant legislation. The Republican Senate did not trouble to initiate measures certain to be defeated in the lower chamber; the latter contented itself with passing a few "pop gun" tariff reductions, equally certain to be defeated in the Senate.

The Republicans in 1892 renominated Harrison and the Democrats renominated Cleveland. Also in the field this time was the new People's Party, usually referred to as the "Populists," with a platform that demanded free silver at a 16 to 1 ratio, an income tax, anti-alien land laws, and government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones. In the campaign, the Democrats made capital of the recent labor disturbances and the McKinley tariff, which not only was keeping prices high for consumers in the hard times, but was causing a decline in federal revenues from imports. At the same time, Cleveland, a strong advocate of the gold standard, gained support from eastern bankers and industrialists by campaigning against the Sherman Silver Purchase Act, which was increasing the circulation of redeemable paper currency and causing a dangerous drain on the federal reserve. On election day, the Democrats came back into power, even winning the Senate. The Populists polled a surprising one million votes. For the first time since 1859, the Democratic party controlled the White House and both branches of Congress.

Mr. President, on that happy note, I shall end here for today, leaving the Democrats in their moment of triumph. With the House, Senate, and White House all in their hands, the future looked rosy and promised the opportunity to make sweeping changes. But, as we shall see in my next address, the rosy glow quickly faded and the sunny skies turned threatening as economic catastrophe intervened.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD my notes to "The Senate, 1884–1892: Watershed Years."

There being no objection, the notes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business is concluded.

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state Senate Joint Resolution 159.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate Joint Resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon (together with minority and supplemental views).

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, this is the war powers resolution, and under the act it becomes the pending business when filed. It was filed this moment. There are 3 calendar days of debate. May I inquire of the Chair, is that interpreted to mean 72 hours of debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON). Yes; it is.

Mr. BAKER. Am I correct also, may I ask the Chair, that that 72 hours is to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Is there, may I further ask the Chair, a designation of how that time is controlled and by whom?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not an agreement that designates the division of time.

Mr. BAKER. Very well. For the time being, Mr. President, I assume that the amount of time that is used by the majority and minority leader or the two managers would be interpreted to be for the proponents and opponents for the purposes of recordkeeping?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I will say for the benefit of Senators that an effort is being made to arrive at a unanimous-consent request to regularize this proceeding and to render it certain, but for the time being we will proceed on this basis.

Mr. President, first I think it would be appropriate to spread of record both the resolution and the report, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution and report be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I amend my request so that it would be the resolution and pertinent excerpts of the report.

There being no objection, the resolution and excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2.(a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every three months. In addition to providing the information required by that section of the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanon groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the respnsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebannon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

CONGRESSIONAL PRIORITY PROCEDURES FOR AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Any joint resolution or bill introduced to amend or repeal this act shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as the case may be. Such joint resolution or bill shall be considered by such committee within fifteen calendar days and may be reported out, together with its recommendations, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(b) Any joint resolution or bill so reported shall become the pending business of the House in question (in the case of the Senate the time for debate shall be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents) and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(c) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall be referred to the committee of the other House named in subsection (1) and shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within fifteen calendar days and shall thereupon become the pending business of such House and shall be voted upon within three calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(d) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such joint resolution within six calendar days after the legislation is referred to the committee of conference. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the Record or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than six calendar days after the conference report is filed. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within 48 hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement.

Amend the title so as to read:

Joint resolution providing statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued United States participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

CALENDAR NO. 405—REPORT NO. 242, TOGETHER WITH MINORITY AND SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS

[To accompany S.J. Res. 159]

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) having considered the same, reports favorably thereon with amendments and recommends that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

PURPOSE

The purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon by making the determination called for in Section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution of 1973 and providing the specific statutory authorization required by Section 5(b) of that Resolution.

BACKGROUND

The Administration decided in August 1982, to send a contingent of U.S. Marines to Beirut as part of a multinational force to help facilitate the PLO's evacuation from the Lebanese capital. On August 20, 1982, following consultations with President Reagan on the use of U.S. forces in such a role, Senators Percy and Pell wrote to the President, recommending that he report this deployment under Section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution. On August 21, 800 French troops arrived, the first contingent of the Multinational Forces (MNF), and on August 25, 800 U.S. Marines landed in Beirut. President Reagan reported to the Congress "consistent with the War Powers Resolution" but stated the Marines would not be in a hostile situation and would be withdrawn within 30 days. On September 1, President Reagan announced his Middle East Peace initiative. On September 11, the Marines were withdrawn.

On September 16, President Bashir Gemayal of Lebanon was assassinated, and on September 16-18, a massacre took place at the Sabra and Shatila Palestinian refugee camps. President Reagan announced on September 21 that U.S. Marines would return to Lebanon as part of an international force. On September 24, Senators Percy and Pell again wrote to the President recommending that the reintroduction of U.S. troops be reported under Section 4(a)(1). On September 29, U.S. Marines took over the Beirut airport area and President Reagan submitted a report "consistent with the War Powers Resoution" but insisting that the marines were "not expected to become engaged in hostilities." On December 15, 1982, 14 Committee Members wrote to the President to say they "would expect Congress to be involved at the earliest possible stage . . . and that formal Congressional authorization would be sought before undertaking long-term or expanded commitments or extending indefinitely the present level of operations."

On March 1, 1983, Senator Percy introduced the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act to provide $100 million in military aid loans and $150 million in economic aid to Lebanon. The Committee reported that bill on May 5 with a requirement that Congress authorize "any substantial change in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon." On May 17, Israel and Lebanon signed the Israeli withdrawal agreement. On May 20, the Senate passed the Committee's bill. The House passed it on June 1 in a slightly modified form, and President Reagan signed it into law on June 27.

In mid-August of this year, fighting broke out between Lebanese Army units and Moslem militia men in South and West Beirut and on August 28, U.S. Marines at the Beirut airport came under fire for the first time. They returned fire, but there were no Marine casualties. However, on August 29, 2 U.S. Marines died and 14 were wounded by hostile shelling. The Marines returned fire, including the use of a helicopter gunship. On August 31, the Senate received a report from President Reagan "consistent with Section 4 of the War Powers Resolution," explaining the circumstances of the Marine casualties but expressing the view that the danger to U.S. forces would be temporary.

On September 3, Israel began its re-deployment to the Awali River. On September 4, heavy fighting broke out between Druze and Christian militia for control of the Chouf. President Reagan told Congressional leaders that the United States had no plans to commit additional troops. On September 6, two more U.S. Marines were killed and two wounded during shelling of the Beirut airport. On September 8, U.S. Navy ships were used to fire back at guns shelling Marine positions.

On September 12, Senator Mathias introduced S.J. Resolution 159, triggering the expedited procedures of Section 6 of the War Powers Resolution. On September 13, following heavy attacks by Druze, Syrian and Palestinian forces on strategic heights overlooking Beirut, the White House said the Marines are now authorized to call on naval and air power not only to defend themselves directly but also to aid other MNF forces and the Lebanese Army in certain circumstances. On September 14, Senator Byrd introduced S.J. Resolution 163, making a congressional determination that Section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution applied to the situation in Lebanon. On September 19, U.S. navy ships fired several hundred shells to help the Lebanese Army beat back attacks on Suq al Gharb, a mountain village on a strategic ridge near Beirut. On September 20, following negotiations with the White House and House Leaders, Senators Baker and Percy introduced S.J. Resolution 166. A companion measure was introduced in the House.

COMMITTEE ACTION

Following the reconvening of the Senate, the Committee held a hearing on September 13 to discuss the situation in Lebanon with officials of the Administration. Assistant Secretary of State Nicholas Veliotes, State Department Legal Advisor Davis Robinson, Director of Political-Military Affairs Jonathan Howe, and Marine Commandant Paul X. Kelly testified before the Committee. On September 21, Secretary of State George Shultz and General Kelly appeared at a second Committee hearing to review the situation in Lebanon and to hear the position of the Reagan Administration with respect to the several resolutions pending before the Committee.

On September 23, the Committee met to consider the pending resolutions on Lebanon and the War Powers Resolution: S.J. Res. 159, offered by Senator Mathias, S.J. Res. 163, offered by Senator Byrd, and S.J. Res. 166, offered by Senator Baker. Prior to voting, Senator Pell requested that Senator Byrd's resolution not be voted on by the Committee at that time.

Senator Mathias' resolution, S.J. Res. 159, was the first order of business. He offered two amendments to his own resolution, one dealing with more frequent reporting requirements and one concerning expedited procedures for future resolutions related to authorizations within the War Powers Resolution framework. Both were adopted by voice vote. Senator Baker then offered his resolution, S.J. Res. 166—modified to include the two Mathias amendments just referred to—as a complete substitute to the Mathias language. Senator Cranston then offered an amendment which would have displaced the Baker proposal. The Cranston proposal would have limited the joint resolution to a simple declaration that the conditions described in Sections 4(a)(1), 4(a)(2), and 4(a)(3) of the War Powers Resolution are now in effect. The Cranston amendment was defeated by a vote to 9 to 7. Senators voting for the Cranston amendment were Pell, Biden, Glenn, Sarbanes, Zorinsky, Cranston, and Dodd. Senators voting against the amendment were Percy, Baker, Helms, Lugar, Mathias, Kassebaum, Boschwitz, Pressler, and Murkowski. Senator Baker's amendment was then adopted by the reverse vote of 9 to 7.

Senator Pell then offered an amendment to reduce the duration of the authorization from 18 months to 6 months. That amendment was adopted by a vote of 9 to 8, with the following Senators voting in the affirmative: Mathias, Pell, Biden, Glenn, Sarbanes, Zorinsky, Tsongas, Cranston, and Dodd. Senators voting in the negative were Percy, Baker, Helms, Lugar, Kassebaum, Boschwitz, Pressler, and Murkowski. After some duscussion, Senator Mathias joined with those voting against the Pell amendment in voting for a motion to reconsider that amendment. With the exception of Senator Mathias, those Senators who had voted for the Pell amendment now voted against the motion. The vote was 9 to 8. On reconsideration, the Pell amendment was then defeated by a voice vote.

The Committee then ordered S.J. Res. 159, as amended by the modified text of S.J. Res. 166, reported favorably to the Senate at the opening of the Senate on Monday, September 26, when, in accordance with the requirements of Section 6 of the War Powers Resolution, it becomes the pending business before the Senate and must be voted on within three calendar days. This report contains the recommendations of the Committee on that resolution, as required by law.

COMMITTEE COMMENTS

United States policy in Lebanon

American objectives.—The Committee believes that Lebanon cannot be isolated from the wider issues of peace and security in the Middle East. The Committee concurs in Secretary Shultz's assessment that "progress toward a peaceful solution in Lebanon will contribute to the broader peace process; setbacks in Lebanon will make the broader effort that much harder."

In the Committee debate, Senator Boschwitz emphasized that the Administration had articulated consistent policy objectives in Lebanon ever since the Marines were first deployed to Beirut in August 1982. In a letter to the Congress on August 24, President Reagan stated that the deployment of the Marines would not in itself resolve the problems of Lebanon. Nevertheless, the Marines would improve the prospects for realizing our objectives in Lebanon: a permanent cessation of hostilities; establishment of a strong, representative central government; withdrawal of all foreign forces; restoration of control by the Lebanese Government throughout the country; and establishment of conditions under which Lebanon no longer can be used as a launching point for attacks against Israel.

These objectives remain the basis of our policy in Lebanon as outlined by Secretary Shultz before the Foreign Relations Committee on September 21, 1983. Similar objectives are cited in the resolution reported out by the Committee.

The Committee notes that a number of steps are being taken to attain these broad policy objectives. American participation in the multinational force is only one of these. Diplomacy remains the principal component, and the diplomatic efforts are supported by the peacekeeping efforts of the Multinational Force. While progress has not been as rapid as hoped for during the past year, important steps have been taken. In May, the Government of Israel and Lebanon with the assistance of the United States reached agreement on the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon. Unfortunately, Syria has not been willing to discuss the withdrawal of its forces despite a formal request from the Government of Lebanon. The Lebanese Government, with our support, also has requested the Arab League to arrange the withdrawal of the Syrians, and is working with moderate Arab countries to achieve that objective. There appears to be a false impression that little is being done on the Lebanese political front.

However, as Senator Boschwitz pointed out, with American encouragement, the Government of President Gemayal has begun the process of reconciliation with dissident segments of the population. On August 31 President Gemayal, with his multiconfessional cabinet, issued an appeal to key supporters and opponents to join in a dialogue on national reconciliation and unity. Although the initial appeal was rejected and the Syrians blocked the participation of some top Muslim political leaders, American Ambassador McFarlane and others are still pressing efforts to reach an agreement.

The Committee supports these attempts and believes the Government of Lebanon must represent fairly all communal and ethnic groups. Injustice and privilege must be eliminated, and security concerns alleviated if the Lebanese will ever reassert national sovereignty.

The Committee also supports efforts to rebuild national institutions which were fractured by eight years of civil conflict and foreign occupation. Foremost of these institutions is a truly national army. Much progress has been made in a relatively short period of time. Significant American aid has helped finance equipment for a mechanized brigade and American personnel have helped train several brigades. As a consequence, the Lebanese Army, which is divided almost evenly between Christians and Muslims, has performed well in recent difficult circumstances. When armed gunmen seized control of the streets of Beirut several weeks ago, for the first time in a decade the Lebanese Army was able to reassert its control over the city. In the mountains, the Lebanese Army has faced a force composed of Palestinians, Syrians, Iranians and Lebanese Druze. The Lebanese Army again has performed well. The Committee recognizes the difficulty of rebuilding a national Army in such a fragmented society and has no illusion that the task will be easily accomplished. The MNF provides important symbolic and other support for this task.

The role of the marines.—The Multinational Force, which includes a contingent of U.S. Marines, is another vehicle for implementing our broader policy objectives in Lebanon. The Committee agrees with Secretary Shultz's assurances that "it is not the mission of our Marines, or of the MNF as a whole, to maintain the military balance in Lebanon by themselves . . . They are an important deterrent, a symbol of the international backing behind the legitimate Government of Lebanon . . ."

The Committee understands that the role of the Marines is limited. The authorization of the presence of the Marines does not remove previous limitations on their deployment. Marine activities are restricted to the "Beirut area" and the number of Marine combat troops based onshore will remain approximately 1,200. The Resolution specifically states that it does not modify Section 4 of the Lebanese Emergency Assistance Act of 1983 which require congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of the U.S. peacekeeping forces.

18-Month authorization.—The Committee voted to authorize the continued presence of U.S. forces for an additional 18 months rather than for a shorter period of 6 months. The debate centered on three issues: (1) would the shorter period place the Marines in a more dangerous position; (2) how would American policy objectives be affected by the shorter period; and (3) how would the congressional prerogatives be affected by a longer period.

The Executive Branch opposed any reference to a specific time period. The 18-month period was part of a compromise reached by the Majority Leadership of the Senate and House with the Executive Branch.

A strong concern was expressed that the compromise might fall apart if Congress imposed a shorter period. This concern prevailed in the Committee's deliberations. Senator Mathias observed that "we are dealing with a very delicate process here." The Senator expressed concern that the broad principles of the War Powers compromise might be abandoned and not reach the floor if the shorter 6-month period was adopted by the Committee. Senator Mathias, who indicated his support for a 6-month period, nevertheless said he felt the issue should be ultimately resolved on the Floor.

During the Committee's hearings and debate, witnesses and Members expressed fears that a shorter time period could result in increased hostile fire on the Marines and complicate the efforts to negotiate a cease-fire and political settlement.

Marine Corps Commandant Paul X. Kelley testified to the Committee on September 13 that a short time limit might stimulate more attacks on the Marines in an effort to encourage a public outcry for their withdrawal. He commented that "I am concerned that we could impose what could prove to be a dangerous time constraint that would be misread by our potential adversaries * * *. It would encourage hostile forces or forces inimical to the best interests, the life and limb of Marines. It would encourage them to be more provocative in an attempt to arouse public sentiment * * *. There still is a possibility that hostile forces would use this as an opportunity to up the ante against our Marines."

A great deal of concern was also expressed about how a short time period would be interpreted in the Middle East, especially in Damascus. The Syrians are aiding the Druze, who have been shelling Marine positions. Senator Percy said a 6-month time limit "might send a false signal which might encourage and place great incentive on the part of the Syrians to make attacks." Members warned that attacks might be increased in an effort to alter American opinions in advance of another debate over the extension of the forces 6 months from now.

A short time period also might encourage the anti-government forces to drag their feet in negotiations. The United States has been prodding the government of Amin Gemayal to take part in talks aimed at forming a broader government of conciliation. President Gemayal recently issued a call for such a conference. But the Syrians have been blocking these efforts, even vetoing the proposed participation of the Lebanese Prime Minister and Speaker of the House, both Muslims. Many believe the Syrians are stalling for time, hoping that continued military pressure on the Lebanese Army and on the Multinational Force will result in the military collapse of the former and the withdrawal of the latter.

Assistant Secretary of State Nicholas Veliotes described the diplomatic problem in the September 13 hearing, saying, "There would be no incentive on the part of those who oppose our policy in Lebanon to seek anything other than a series of violent confrontations, thinking to wait for the time limit and then influence American opinion in the Congress. We think that a six-month authorization would be a grave error."

By contrast, approval of an 18-month time period shows that the United States is willing to exercise patience as well as diplomacy, to give the peacekeeping efforts and negotiations a chance. Secretary of State Shultz testified of September 21 that "the 18-month period seemed like along enough period so that you had some room for maneuver, and it had the effect of allowing people who were concerned both on the Congressional side of this constitutional issue and the Presidential side both to keep their principles intact."

None of the Members of the Committee expects that the problems in Lebanon will be solved quickly or easily. But it is the view of the majority that a 6-month time period would reduce prospects for success even further.

In acting on the Resolution, the Committee also approved two amendments by Senator Mathias which provide Congress with additional check reins. Congress will receive reports from the Administration every 3 months on the current situation. More important, from the procedural view, the Resolution was amended to ensure that in the event a resolution to repeal the authorization is reported by this committee or the House Foreign Affairs Committee, it will be considered in each House under expedited procedures. This combined approach of the 18-month authorization and the procedural amendments should help serve the peacekeeping and diplomatic efforts and the institutional requirements of both branches of governments.

WAR POWERS

Applicability of the War Powers Resolution

(1) Actual or imminent hostilities.—Section 2(b) of this Resolution includes a Congressional determination that actual or imminent hostilities involving U.S. Armed Forces clearly came into being on August 29, 1983.

The President's report to Congress describes the circumstances surrounding the heavy exchanges of fire on that date:

On August 29, sporadic fighting between Lebanese Armed Forces and various armed factions took place in South Beirut; from time to time during the course of this fighting, positions in the vicinity of the Beirut airport manned by U.S. Marines of the MNF came under small arms fire (without injury to U.S. personnel), and this fire was returned. On August 29, fighting erupted again. Marine positions came under mortar, rocket, and small-arms fire, with the result that two Marines were killed and fourteen wounded. In addition, several artillery rounds fell near the USS Iwo Jima (an amphibious support vessel lying offshore), with no resulting damage or injuries. As contemplated by their rules of engagement, U.S. Marines returned fire with artillery, small arms, and in one instance, rocket fire from a helicopter gunship. There were additional exchanges of fire earlier today, August 30, without injury to U.S. personnel.

Such exchanges have continued, with additional casualties and fatalities, until the present. Naval gunfire support on specific locations has been carried out in an effort to protect our forces on the ground. In addition, tactical air support and reconnaissance has been authorized. Although there have been continuing efforts to arrange a ceasefire and to achieve a broader, more permanent arrangement which would reduce the occurrence or imminence of hostilities, there is no immediate indication that this situation will soon change significantly. Therefore, the hostile situation has been a continuing one.

In enacting the War Powers Resolution in 1973, Congress made little effort to go beyond the "plain meaning" of key terms "hostilities" and "situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances." These terms originated in the early Senate versions of the Resolution and prompted little subsequent discussion. The House Foreign Affairs Committee later substituted them for its original phrase, "armed conflict." because the term "hostilities" was considered "somewhat broader in scope." "In addition to a situation in which fighting actually has begun," the Committee wrote, "hostilities also encompasses a state of confrontation in which no shots have been fired but where there is a clear and present danger of armed conflict."

In short, the exchange of fire with hostile forces would indicate an outbreak of hostilities, and a high probability of such exchanges would suggest "imminent involvement." Brief, non-recurring situations such as occasional sniper fire would not suggest the continuing dangers associated with an ongoing set of hostile circumstances.

Arguments have been made, that a hostile situation was not indicated by the present circumstances because the Marines:

(a) Only returned rather than initiated fire;

(b) Acted only in self-defense;

(c) Remained essentially in one location, rather than taking offensive actions;

(d) Performed a mission of "peacekeeping," "presence," or "interposition".

However, there is nothing in the legislative history of the War Powers Act to indicate that any of these considerations would alter the fact that "hostilities" are indicated. For the same reason, it is not conclusive that an area commander may have decided, as in the present situation, to make his men eligible for "hostile fire pay." Nor is it necessary or sufficient that fatalities occur in order to conclude that hostilities are involved.

(2) Need for authorization or extension.—The requirements of Section 5(b) of the Wars Powers Resolution speak for themselves:

(b) Within 60 calendar days after a report is submitted or is required to be submitted pursuant to section 4(a)(1), whichever is earlier, the President shall terminate any use of United States Armed Forces with respect to which such report was submitted (or required to be submitted), unless the Congress (1) has declared war or has enacted a specific authorization for such use of United States Armed Forces, (2) has extended by law such 60-day period, or (3) is physically unable to meet as a result of an armed attack upon the United States. Such 60-day period shall be extended for not more than an additional 30 days if the President determines and certifies to the Congress in writing that unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of United States Armed Forces requires the continued use of such armed forces in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of such forces.

Two points about this language should be emphasized, however. First, the actual submission of a report by the President is not a prerequisite to the operation of the requirement for an authorization. The language "submitted or is required to be submitted" was obviously intended to cover situations in which the required report is either not submitted at all or is submitted late. In other words, the President does not need to certify that a hostile situation is involved under Section 4 in order to be bound by the requirement for an authorization in Section 5.

Second, the available 30-day extension of the deadline is not simply a matter of Presidential discretion. The President must certify that he is in the course of withdrawing U.S. forces and needs the extra time in order to do so safely because of "unavoidable military necessity."

(3) Congressional procedures.—Assuming that hostilities involving U.S. forces can be said to have begun on August 29, the 60-day period began on August 31, since that is when the report would have been due. (It also happens to be the date on which the President's report of August 30 was actually submitted, which is the alternative starting point.) In other words, the War Powers Resolution allows for a 62-day period from the outbreak of hostilies. Counting forward 60 days from August 31 would be October 30.

Under Section 6 of the War Powers Resolution, the Committee Resolution becomes the pending business in the Senate as soon as it is reported, after which the Senate has up to three calendar days to vote on it. Further procedures are prescribed to assure Committee and floor consideration by the House and a House-Senate Conference prior to the 60-day deadline. The House Foreign Affairs Committee approved a nearly identical resolution on September 22 by a vote of 30 to 6.

To facilitate congressional oversight of this authorization the Committee added two further procedures proposed by Senator Mathias. One provision would require the President to provide detailed reports on the situation of the Multinational Force every 3 months. A second provision assures that resolutions to amend or repeal this authorization shall be considered in Committee within 15 days and, if reported to the Senate, shall receive consideration in both the House and Senate. Such consideration is also assured for changes reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Constitutional considerations

This is the first time since the enactment of the War Powers Resolution on November 7, 1973, that Congress has faced the task of considering a specific authorization for the involvement of U.S. Armed Forces in hostilities. The text and history of the War Powers Resolution provide little guidance as to how such an authorization should be drafted. The War Powers Resolution was passed to ensure that Congress would have an opportunity to exercise its constitutional responsibilities; the Resolution itself gives little guidance about how it was supposed to do so in any given case.

(1) Declaration of war analogy.—One approach is to regard the task of Congress in enacting a specific authorization as similar to its function in declaring war. The power to declare war, of course, is the particular authority and function assigned to Congress in Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution. By this analogy, the role of Congress is to decide the general question of whether a particular commitment of forces to hostilities in a given part of the world is worth the costs and risks expected from it. Once having exercised this broad judgment—and acting as a check upon Presidential excesses—Congress arguably should not seek to limit or direct the activities of the Armed Forces. Such decisions (so the argument might run) were meant to be exercised only by the President as Commander in Chief, under Article II, Section 2. Frustration with the efforts of the Continental Congress to prosecute the Revolutionary War and subsequent conflicts led the drafters of the Constitution to limit Congressional involvement to the power to "declare" rather than to "make" war as originally proposed. Thus, declarations of war have typically been brief, general statements, without time limits or other specific restrictions.

(2) Legislative limitations.—A different approach to the drafting of a specific authorization is to enact particular limitations or criteria which circumscribe the scope of the commitment. Such specifications might include the duration, location, size, cost and mission of U.S. deployments, as well as requirements based upon future developments. Presidents have traditionally resisted such constraints as infringements on the Commander in Chief power, but no definitive resolution of such questions has ever been achieved.

Members of Congress are therefore confronted with the need to decide a novel issue regarding the role appropriate of the legislative branch: how far should the Congress go in defining the authority being granted to the President in a situation of hostilities? Is it appropriate for Congress to try to predict, and to protect legislatively against, every foreseeable risk which our forces might encounter in their mission, or to anticipate and define each angle of Presidential flexibility to respond to events? Or is it part of the responsibility which Congress is insisting upon for itself under the Constitution to recognize the inevitable risks and costs of any foreign military involvement—and to accept such risks as part of the decision to approve its initiation or continuation?

Scope of Senate Joint Resolution 159

The authorization recommended by the Committee takes a middle ground on the question of general approval and specific limitations. While confining its terms to the mandate of the Multinational Force and preserving existing statutory provisions relating to "any substantial expansion in the number or role", the resolution recognizes the possible need for "protective measures to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force".

As the Chairman of the Committee, Senator Percy, has argued, any suggestion that the terms of this authorization resemble the Tonkin Gulf Resolution of 1964 or amount to a "blank check" for Presidential actions is simply unfounded. The resolution is limited and specific in a number of respects.

(1) Duration.—Attention has focused on the 18-month duration of this proposed authorization, as if time limitations are the only effective measure of statutory restraints. Six months has become the benchmark of those who regard this proposal as a "blank check." In fact, however, any time limit is an arbitrary choice, having little to do with the events in Lebanon or the policy choices involved in maintaining a Multinational Force. If Congress is to decide in the future against further U.S. participation, it could just as easily make such a judgment in 2 months or 10 months.

(2) Active oversight.—Whatever the time limits, the test of Congressional responsibility will be the degree to which Congress actively follows the situation in Lebanon and, if necessary, takes steps to adjust this authorization once it is enacted. Senator Mathias offered two amendments in the Committee, both adopted by voice vote, which increase the ability of Congress to play such as active role. His amendment to Section 4 requires the President to report to Congress every 3 months, rather than every 6 months, on the situation in Lebanon and the steps being taken to fulfill the objective of the Multinational Force. His second amendment added a new Section 8 to the resolution, providing for expedited procedures in the consideration of any amendment or repeal of this authorization.

Even with these additions, of course, Congress must follow through in the exercise of its responsibilities through oversight and amendment. Such an approach is far preferable to restrictions which avoid the difficult choices and prevent the possibility of decision through inaction.

Three principal limitations on the U.S. role are contained in that agreement: the number of U.S. troops will be approximately 1,200, they will operate in the Beirut area in support of the Lebanese Government, and they are not expected to perform a combat mission. According to Marine Commandant Kelley, in his testimony of September 21 before the Committee, the number of Marine personnel actually on the ground in Lebanon has been closer to 1,500, since about 300 support personnel are rotated onshore at any given time. But the size, location, and mission of U.S. forces have not substantially changed, despite the outbreak of active hostilities last month.

(4) Protective measures.—The Committee recognizes that performing the role of peacekeeping forces is a new and unfamiliar role, not only for the troops themselves, but for the U.S. Government and the American public as well. Having to stand between hostile forces in the same, sometimes vulnerable locations without taking and maintaining the offensive can be a difficult posture to maintain, particularly for United States Marines. From time to time, U.S. forces must respond to direct attacks or take protective actions for their own defense. The Committee does not believe that such actions necessarily change the role of the U.S. forces, so long as the task of the U.S. forces is not to duplicate or supplant the functions of the Lebanese Armed Forces or to redeploy from the Beirut area, or in other respects to exceed the limited mandate of the Multinational Force or the limitations of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983.

From the outset of the Multinational Force, it has been assumed that the various national contingents are part of a common effort. Therefore, not only do they have the usual right to defend themselves, as recognized in the September 25 agreement, but also a general responsibility to come to each other's assistance when called upon to do so. The resolution therefore acknowledges the possible necessity of actions "to ensure the safety" of other contingents of the Force.

(5) Limitations on expansion.—"Any substantial expansion in the number or role in Lebanon of United States Armed Forces" would call into play the provision of Section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, requiring the President to seek authorization for such expansion. That legislation was signed by the President on June 27 of this year. Section 7 of this resolution makes clear that it is not intended to affect that requirement.

However, during the Committee's hearing on September 21 with Secretary of State Shultz, some question arose as to whether the Reagan Administration felt constrained by this provision.

Senator SARBANES.* * * Is it the Administration's position that what they need to do is consult with the Congress, or that they need to obtain an authorization from the Congress, that they could not expand the number or role without a specific Congressional authorization?

Secretary SHULTZ. I think the President, or perhaps any of you if you were President, thinking about your role, your Constitutional role as Commander in Chief, would be very reluctant to tie your hands and say that you could only order U.S. forces to do something or other after the Congress had authorized it.

Senator SARBANES. So it is your position, then, that you could substantially expand them without a Congressional authorization?

Secretary SHULTZ. The constitutional reservation goes to the President's role as Commander in Chief, and therefore to his capacity to be in charge of the deployment of the armed forces of the United States. I have no doubt that he will continue to assert that role.

The Committee is concerned that Secretary of State Shultz seemed reluctant to accept the need for an authorization to expand substantially the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon as required by law. That provision was adopted after very careful deliberation by this Committee and on the basis of very clear assurances by the Reagan Administration that it would seek an authorization for that purpose. However, it is true, as the legislative history of this provision clearly reveals, that Congress did not insist upon specific prior authorization for any such expansion in numbers or role. The issue of prior authorization was a principal subject of discussion in the Committee and on the House side. The Administration strongly opposed any such requirement and, in the end, the Congress did not insist upon it. The following statement by Congressman Hamilton during the final debate on June 1 on a House-Senate compromise version of the bill, described the congressional interpretation of this provision:

The requirement for congressional authorization is not meant to impede the performance of the limited functions currently being performed by the U.S. Marines in Beirut or to interfere with their ability to defend themselves if attacked. However, any decision to expand significantly the role in Lebanon of United States Armed Forces would require statutory authorization.

If possible, the President should obtain authorization from the Congress before any significant change is made in the size or role of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The Congress is aware, however, that in order to promote peace within Lebanon and fulfill international commitments, the deployment of a new or expanded peacekeeping force involving U.S. forces might be necessary prior to final passage of congressional authorization." However, congressional action should be obtained at the earliest possible time. In any case, the Congress expects full consultations by the executive branch with the Congress in a timely fashion should any change be contemplated in the size or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon, including any change in conjunction with the creation of a new peacekeeping force.

In its own final deliberations on this provision, the Committee acted on the basis of assurances contained in an April 20 letter from Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam:

THE DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, April 20, 1983.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that the House Foreign Affairs Committee has adopted an amendment to the Lebanon supplemental which provides that the President shall obtain statutory authorization from the Congress with respect to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into Lebanon in conjunction with agreements for the withdrawal of foreign forces and the creation of a new multinational force. I understand that this language was deliberately drafted so as not to interfere with the President's ability to begin such an introduction, if circumstances urgently require it, while Congress is considering his request for statutory authorization.

Under these circumstances, the HFAC amendment correctly described what this administration intends to do, is consistent with what we have done in comparable situations in the past (such as the Sinai Multinational Force), and is therefore acceptable to us. It is our intention to seek authorization from Congress as soon as possible following the completion of the ongoing negotiations, and we trust that Congress and the executive branch would then work expeditiously together with the objective of obtaining such authorization, if at all possible, prior to such new deployments.

I strongly hope that your committee will not find it necessary to deal with this question in the context of section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution. It would be highly premature and unwise, and potentially damaging to the integrity of the resolution, for Congress to prejudge the possible applicability of that section to future arrangements which have not yet been negotiated and future circumstances which cannot yet be predicted. Such an action, which would amount to a public finding that U.S. forces will be exposed to an imminent risk of involvement in hostilities, is in no way a foregone conclusion, and could give entirely the wrong public impression as to what results these negotiations are intended to produce. Surely it would be far preferable for Congress to reserve judgment on this matter (as we will) until it can evaluate the circumstances as they develop, knowing that the provisions of the war powers resolution will, of course, remain available.

I appreciate this opportunity to comment on your committee's work, and hope that we can arrive at a result which accommodates our mutual interests in this matter.

Sincerely,

KENNETH W. DAM.

[Emphasis added.]

The Committee expects that the commitments made the Administration on this point will be kept.

Institutional accommodations

This resolution is the reflection of a delicate compromise, carefully constructed in recognition of the family-held positions of both the legislative and executive branches. However, the Committee believes that the resolution is fully consistent with, and supportive of, the constitutional role of Congress recognized in the War Powers Resolution. As our former colleague Jacob Javits—the principal Senate author of the War Powers Resolution—expressed it in a statement provided to all Members prior to the markup:

The Administration and the Congress have each gained a major point in the proposed compromise on the War Powers Resolution. Congress has established the proposition that it may set the clock running under the resolution even if the President does not trigger it by giving the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution when U.S. troops are deployed abroad into hostilities or the imminent threat of them. The President has gained the point that for the situation in Lebanon the authority Congress gives him to continue their involvement must be by joint not concurrent resolution, thereby, requiring the President's signature. This compromise avoids a constitutional crisis at this juncture. Though it may not settle the issue, it is an important step along the way.

MINORITY VIEWS

We strongly oppose the joint resolution on Lebanon sponsored by Senators Baker and Percy and approved in the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 9-7. In our judgment, its enactment would constitute (1) a dereliction of Congressional responsibility to uphold the principles and procedures of the War Powers Resolution of 1973; (2) a failure to require of the Administration a clearly articulated and persuasive statement of the mission which U.S. Marines have been deployed in Lebanon to implement; and (3) and 18-month "blank check" under which the Administration could pursue hitherto unspecified military objectives in Lebanon while asserting that it is operating with full Congressional sanction. These gravely serious flaws warrant elaboration:

(1) Dereliction of congressional responsibility relating to the War Powers Resolution.—The Baker-Percy language has been presented as a "bipartisan compromise" which, in the interest of avoiding a dispute over "legalisms," would allow Congress and the executive to affirm principles which are in conflict. This would present, it is argued, a united front regarding U.S. policy in Lebanon.

We do not believe that the issues surrounding proper implementation of the War Powers Resolution are mere "legalisms." At issue are constitutional questions of immense gravity. The War Powers Resolution is law, a law passed over President Nixon's veto by overwhelming majorities in both houses. The reservations expressed by the executive branch about the resolution's constitutionality do not diminish or compromise its legal standing. In the absence of a Supreme Court ruling, only Congress can change or nulify that law. But by failing to demand adherence to obligations prescribed in the Resolution, Congress would abdicate its responsibility to uphold the law. In any event, Congress must not concede to the executive branch the contention that the War Powers Resolution is not binding in all of its particulars.

One approach, first proposed by Minority Leader, Byrd and advocated in Committee by Senator Cranston, would have limited any joint resolution to a simple declaration that key provisions of section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution were triggered by hostilities in Lebanon on August 29, 1983, which resulted in the deaths of 2 Marines. Enactment of such a resolution would not entail a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon. It would, however, achieve the essential result of affirming unmistakably the applicability of War Powers Resolution procedures, including the requirement for Congressional authorization for the maintenance of U.S. forces in Lebanan beyond 60-90 days. Unfortunately, this proposal was defeated in Committee by a vote of 9-7.

The determined unwillingness of the administration to recognize that the procedures stipulated by the War Powers Resolution are now in fact required became starkly evident during the Secretary of State's testimony before the Committee. Under questioning on September 21 about the relationship between the Baker-Percy resolution and future U.S. actions in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz was assiduously careful to reserve for the Commander in Chief a full range of options—regarding the scope of operations, the number of U.S. forces, and the duration of the involvement—even in disregard if necessary of the War Powers Resolution framework the Baker-Percy resolution would purportedly impose on the U.S. presence there. Congress cannot ignore what this means. The Administration is prepared to participate in a procedure which would give some appearance of creating a War Powers Resolution framework without really conceding that any such framework exists.

Not only is the War Powers Resolution the law; its applicability to the situation in Lebanon is manifest. Accordingly, we believe strongly that any resolution passed should allow no ambiguity as to whether the procedures set forth in the War Powers Resolution are required. By intentionally side-stepping the issue, the Baker-Percy resolution fails to meet that test.

(2) The absence of a clearly defined policy.—The constitutional ambiguity of the Baker-Percy resolution is paralleled by an alarming vagueness concerning the mission of the U.S. forces whose presence in Lebanon the resolution would purport to authorize. One year ago, on August 25, 1982, when U.S. Marines were introduced into Lebanon, their mission was limited and precise: to provide a temporary buffer that would allow the evacuation from Lebanon of elements of the Palestine Liberation Organization within a specified period of time. Shortly thereafter, when the Marines were reintroduced into Lebanon, they were deployed to perform, as part of a Multinational Force, the less precisely-worded mission set forth in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters between the United States and Lebanese Governments. That agreement did, however, make clear that the U.S. military role would be confined to "the Beirut area" and would preclude involvement in combat.

While citing the September 25 agreement, the Baker-Percy resolution is drafted so as to be susceptible to an extremely broad—almost infinitely elastic—interpretation of the mission associated with the presence of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The "purposes" cited in Section 2 include "the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon" and the restoration of "full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory." Thus, over the period of 1 year, the stated mission of U.S. forces in Lebanon has expanded from a limited role, the feasibility of which Congress could evaluate, to a role too nebulous for Congress to evaluate and too far-reaching for U.S. military forces alone possibly to accomplish. consequently, the effect of the resolution is to provide Congressional acquiescence in a policy involving American soldiers in a commitment the scope of which has yet to be defined even by its proponents.

A major advantage of the Byrd-Cranston proposal to invoke section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution is that it would require the Administration to submit for Congressional evaluation a clear statement of military mission. This the Baker-Percy resolution would not do. It is not an example of any "Vietnam syndrome" to find in that resolution a disturbing similarity to the "Gulf of Tonkin" resolution of 1964 which, being comparably vague and invoking the necessity of protecting American forces, was used by a different Administration to assert that it possessed Congressional support for an Indochina policy which proved to be one of everwidening involvement.

(3) An 18-month blank check.—Since we take as serious the Administration's patent unwillingness to be bound by the stipulations of the War Powers Resolution, the duration of the Baker-Percy "authorization" is technically a moot point. Practically, however, a shorter "authorization" would at least require that Congress face again the issues—constitutional and policy—which Congress faces now but which the Baker-Percy formulation would allow it negligently to defer. Accordingly, we supported—but failed in a 9–8 vote to achieve—the substitution of a 6-month "authorization" period, after which these issues would again necessarily be joined if U.S. forces remain in Lebanon. We reject the argument that a time period shorter than 18 months will endanger the lives of American soldiers by inviting hostile action against them intended to sway U.S. public opinion against a continued U.S. presence. If the Administration had offered a clearly-defined mission in Lebanon for the U.S. Armed Forces and had also acknowledged its legal obligations under the War Powers Resolution, such a limited "authorization" might be unnecessary. But if the Baker-Percy formulation is to be adopted, it should certainly stipulate a duration short enough to require Congress to review soon the crucial questions surrounding the United States involvement in Lebanon. We believe in any case that to pass this resolution would represent a grave abdication of congressional responsibility.

SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS OF SENATOR BIDEN

In concur with the basic arguments against the Baker-Percy resolution expressed in the Minority Views. I want to emphasize, however, that I would not support any authorization for troops in Lebanon of any duration absent much more clearly defined goals and a reasonable prospect of attaining those goals.

APPENDIX

THE LEBANON EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1983

SEC. 4. (a) The President shall obtain statutory authorization from the Congress with respect to any substantial expansion in the number or role in Lebanon of United States Armed Forces, including any introduction of United States Armed Forces into Lebanon in conjunction with agreements providing for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and for the creation of a new multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND LEBANON ON UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN A MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN BEIRUT EFFECTED BY EXCHANGE OF NOTES AT BEIRUT SEPTEMBER 25, 1982, ENTERED INTO FORCE SEPTEMBER 25, 1982

Beirut, September 25, 1982.

His Excellency FOUAD BUTRUS,
Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Beirut,

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to Your Excellency's note of 25 September 1982 requesting the deployment of an Amreican Force to the Beirut area. I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my Government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area. It is understood that the presence of such an American Force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, an objective which is fully shared by my Government, and thereby further efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred.

I have the further honor to inform Your Excellency that my Government accepts the terms and conditions concerning the presence of the American Force in the Beirut area as set forth in your note, and that Your Excellency's note and this reply accordingly constitute an agreement between our two Governments.

ROBERT DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States.

REPUBLIQUE LIBANAISE,
MINISTERE DES AFFAIRES ETRANGERES,
Beirut the 25th of September 1982.

His Excellency ROBERT DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to the urgent discussions between representatives of our two governments concerning the recent tragic events which have occurred in the Beirut area, and to consultations between my government and the Secretary General of the United Nations pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 521. On behalf of the Republic of Lebanon, I wish to inform Your Excellency's Government of the determination of the Government of Lebanon to restore its sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and thereby to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring an end to violence that has recurred. To this end, Israeli forces will withdraw from the Beirut area.

In its consultations with the Secretary General, the Government of Lebanon has noted that the urgency of the situation requires immediate action, and the Government of Lebanon, therefore, is, in conformity with the objectives in U.N. Security Council Resolution 521, proposing to several nations that they contribute forces to serve as a temporary Multinational Force (MNF) in the Beirut area.The mandate of the MNF will be to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and thereby provide the Multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) in the Beirut area. This presence will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, and thereby further efforts of my government to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred. The MNF may undertake other functions only by mutual agreement.

In the foregoing context, I have the honor to propose that the United States of America deploy a force of approximately 1,200 personnel to Beirut, subject to the following terms and conditions:

The American military force shall carry out appropriate activities consistent with the mandate of the MNF.

Command authority over the American Force will be exercised exclusively by the United States Government through existing American military channels.

The LAF and MNF will form a Liaison and Coordination Committee, composed of representatives of the MNF participating governments and chaired by the representatives of my Government. The Liaison and Coordination Committee will have two essential components: (A) Supervisory liaison; and (B) Military and technical liaison and coordination.

The American Force will operate in close coordination with the LAF. To assure effective coordination with the LAF, the American Force will assign liaison officers to the LAF and the Government of Lebanon will assign liaison officers to the American Force. The LAF liaison officers to the American Force will, inter alia, perform liaison with the civilian population and with the U.N. observers and manifest the authority of the Lebanese Government in all appropriate situations. The American Force will provide security for LAF personnel operating with the U.S. contingent.

In carrying out its mission, the American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense.

It is understood that the presence of the American Force will be needed only for a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the current situation. The MNF contributors and the Government of Lebanon will consult fully concerning the duration of the MNF presence. Arrangements for the departure of the MNF will be the subject of special consultations between the Government of Lebanon and the MNF participating governments. The American Force will depart Lebanon upon any request of the President of Lebanon or upon the decision of the President of the United States.

The Government of Lebanon and the LAF will take all measures necessary to ensure the protection of the American Force's personnel, to include securing assurances from all armed elements not now under the authority of the Lebanese Government that they will refrain from hostilities and not interfere with any activities of the NMF.

The American Force will enjoy both the degree of freedom and movement and the right to undertake those activities deemed necessary for the performance of its mission for the support of its personnel. Accordingly, it shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded the administrative and technical staff of the American Embassy in Beirut, and shall be exempt from immigration and customs requirements, and restrictions on entering or departing Lebanon. Personnel, property and equipment of the American Force introduced into Lebanon shall be exempt from any form of tax, duty, charge or levy.

I have the further honor to propose, if the foregoing is acceptable to Your Excellency's Government, that Your Excellency's reply to that effect, together with this Note, shall constitute an agreement between our two governments.

Please accept, Your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

FOUAD BOUTROS,
Deputy-Prime Minister,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[Following are the texts of three resolution considered by the committee on September 23, 1983.]

S.J. RES. 159

Whereas the achievement of peace and stability in an independent Lebanon is an important national objective of the United States and a vital step toward a broader peace settlement in the Middle East; and

Whereas United States Armed Forces, in combination with forces from France, Italy, and Great Britain have performed a constructive role in assisting the Government of Lebanon in its efforts to restore the stability and prosperity of that country; and

Whereas under article 1, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, the Congress has the responsibility to make decisions regarding the commitment and maintenance of United States Armed Forces abroad, as recognized by the War Powers Resolution of 1973 (Public Law 93–148); and

Whereas the circumstances of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon, beginning with the fatal attack on United States Marine positions on August 29, and the further exchanges of fire which have resulted in continuing United States casualties, clearly indicate a situation of hostilities or imminent involvement in hostilities by United States forces, as contemplated by section 4(a)(1) of Public Law 93–148; and

Whereas this situation requires congressional authorization to continue the presence of United States Armed Forces in a situation of hostilities or imminent involvement in hostilities for longer than sixty days, as provided in section 5(b) of Public Law 93–148: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Lebanon Peacekeeping Resolution".

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this authorization, the sixty-day period specified in section 5(b) of Public Law 93–148 is determined to have begun on August 31, 1983.

SEC. 3. The President is authorized to maintain United States Armed Forces in Lebanon as part of a multinational peacekeeping force for a period of one hundred and twenty days from the expiration of the sixty-day period specified in section 5(b) of Public Law 93–148.

S.J. RES. 163

Whereas United States Armed Forces have been deployed in Lebanon since September 1982, as participants in a Multinational Peacekeeping Force at the request of the Government of Lebanon;

Whereas since August 28, 1983, United States Armed Forces have been introduced into hostilities and into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances;

Whereas as a result of having been introduced into such hostilities, four United States Marines have been killed and numerous others have been wounded as a result of hostile fire in Lebanon since August 28, 1983;

Whereas such events have required that United States Armed Forces return hostile fire in Lebanon as a matter of necessary and essential self-defense;

Whereas on September 13, 1983, the Department of State announced that United States Marines in Lebanon have been authorized to "use firepower—their own and offshore firepower in defense of the Marines, the other members of the multinational force and the Lebanese armed forces, if they (are) under attack and if that attack would endanger the Marines or the multinational force"; and

Whereas United States Armed Forces in Lebanon are receiving hostile fire pay as a result of the judgment of the area commander that the circumstances so warrant: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That as of August 28, 1983, United States Armed Forces in Lebanon were introduced "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances," within the meaning of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93–148).

S.J. RES. 166

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over is own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provision of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letter between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every six months. In addition to providing the information required by that section on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the Security Council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised that a portion of the unanimous-consent request to deal with the debate times has now been approved by the distinguished minority leader, and I will put this request at this time. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on this resolution, which began at 2 p.m. today, extend until not later than 5 p.m. today, and that the time between 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. today will be under the control of the majority and minority leaders or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope we can clear a unanimous-consent request for the handling of this matter for tomorrow, Wednesday, and perhaps Thursday later in the day.

Mr. President, I now designate the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee (Mr. PERCY) to manage the time on this side. Mr. President, I believe that the distinguished chairman of the committee is prepared now to assume the management of this resolution. I have a statement that I will make shortly after the chairman makes whatever statement he wishes and after the manager on behalf of the minority makes whatever statement he wishes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield just briefly, I, for today, designate the distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) to control the time on this side, or his designee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now yield the floor so that the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee may proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for that purpose.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I, first of all, would like to express deep appreciation to the distinguished majority leader for his leadership in the development of this resolution. I support him fully in his efforts and am proud to cosponsor the resolution to achieve an accommodation on this issue. I therefore joined with him in introducing the resolution and supporting it in committee.

I would also like to bring to the attention of the Senate the distinguished work of our minority leader. He has felt very, very deeply about the War Powers Act. It is one of the most important single things the Congress has accomplished in its 207-year history. It deals with a fundamental, constitutional principal, a principle which when not observed in the Vietman war and the South Korean war divided this country as it has never before been divided. There is no way we can carry out a foreign policy unless the people of the United States are behind it, and there is no way we can carry it out without the support of Congress, particularly when it involves war. What the framers of the Constitution clearly intended when they said "declare war" was "make war," and "that the Congress and only the Congress can make war." The problem is: We found ourselves in a situation where it was just out of style to declare war. We have not declared war since World War II; 600,000 young men engaged in Vietnam. Was that not a war? It certainly was by the definition of the framers of the Constitution, and certainly that was the view of John McCloy, an eminent international lawyer, former chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank, former High Commissioner in Germany, who testified for hours before the committee. He did months of research work. His testimony should be read by every single Senator and by every President and by every member of the executive branch, the State Department, and Defense Department if they have any doubt about what the framers of the Constitution really intended.

What the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished majority leader have done is brought us back to square one. They brought us right back to what our Founding Fathers debated and deliberated and in their wisdom determined how and when and under what conditions this country should engage in war.

So what we have done for the past several years is simply go back into history and reconstruct and update the Constitution through a statute.

I was so troubled by this that I introduced the first resolution of many resolutions into the Congress; 30 days later, in his infinite wisdom, Senator JAVITS joined together with Senator STENNIS and many of us as cosponsors in proposing not just a sense-of-the-Senate resolution but a law. It became, over the veto of President Nixon, the War Powers Act.

These are momentous days in the Senate. The distinguished minority leader has put on the RECORD the history of the Senate as it has never been portrayed before, updating it in every nuance, every action, important and unimportant, that has occurred in this body. Certainly I hope he will write that final chapter and talk about what this Congress has done to give full flower and full implementation to the true meaning of the Constitution and tell the Congress what its duty and responsibility is in connection with war. Never again let us get into a war and have it renounced by half, or maybe two-thirds, of the country and have the Congress reluctantly being dragged, kicking and screaming, deeper, and deeper, and deeper into the quicksands of a war thousands of miles removed. Let us know exactly what we are doing. Let us know exactly who is taking us there. Let us know exactly that we are following the intent and purpose of the framers of the Constitution. The War Powers Act does exactly that.

As the Secretary of State implied to us in testimony the other day, any of us that might be President—and he hinted several Members at the podium hope to be President—would want any restraints placed on them. They would want maximum flexibility.

But I can report that in the President's home State, the people of Illinois, are following this matter with tremendous interest. We came into a war, Civil War, a war between the States, that divided this Nation, but we did it knowingly and in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. We went into Vietnam, a war that divided the country, burdened us with debt, gave us rampant inflation, divided us as we have never been divided before. This put us in a position where we were not proud of the way we finally extracted ourselves by a mandate, a mandate of the Congress of the United States 50,000 lives later.

All we are trying to do is to present it. What the President is doing is now reaching out to find a way to do with us.

The provision before us is not perfect, but it moves us a long way in the direction of sharing the responsibility, that awesome responsibility, which cannot and must not be assumed only by the President of the United States. Congress must take most of that responsibility.

Mr. President, none of the members of the committee believes that choices facing us in Lebanon are easy. The problems of Lebanon are complex and do not lend themselves to quick or simple solutions. Many of the Lebanese difficulties are self-inflicted but we must not overlook external forces which have interfered for a decade in internal Lebanese affairs. The Syrian Army is the single largest military force in Lebanon. PLO terrorists, Iranians, and Libyans are all active in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I pause at this moment to make note of the fact that the President did make a remarkable statement to the United Nations a few hours ago.

Several of us—Senator COHEN and I, joined by Senator MOYNIHAN—heard the President give that message. It was a remarkable message—an intelligent, unemotional message to the world—and many aspects of it could be commented upon.

At the conclusion of my comments, I will ask unanimous consent that the full text of the President's statement be printed in the RECORD. At this point in the proceedings, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an extract from the President's speech, where he refers to the trouble in the Middle East.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In Lebanon, we, along with France, Italy and the United Kingdom, have worked for a ceasefire, for the withdrawal of all external forces, and for restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Mr. PERCY. The United States has a national interest in seeing that stability is returned to Lebanon and to assist the Lebanese in reestablishing their own sovereignty. A failure to work for these goals could seriously undermine American interests throughout the region. We must not lose sight of the fact that the problems of Lebanon cannot be isolated from the wider issues of peace and security in the Middle East.

Since August 1982, the administration has articulated consistent policy objectives.

I cite these because there have been intimations from some of our colleagues that we have not had a policy, that we have not had a consistent policy, that we have not had a steady policy, that we are just going day by day, hour by hour. Mr. President, these administration policies have been there from the outset. They have been updated; they have been improved upon; but, in essence, they are the objectives with which we have started. They are as follows:

A permanent cessation of hostilities; establishment of a strong, representative central government; withdrawal of all foreign forces; restoration of control by the Lebanese Government throughout the country; and, establishment of conditions under which Lebanon no longer can be used as a launching point for attacks against Israel.

A couple of years ago, I stood on the Israeli northern border, traveled from one end to the other, saw at the end of the 7 months what a difference a ceasefire made.

Up to that point, not one, single life had been lost; not one injury had been inflicted in 7 months. Yet, before that cease-fire, children had attended schools in bomb shelters. Bomb shelters constituted the largest part of the cost of every hospital built in the northern areas of Israel.

The widows with whom I spoke and the maimed soldiers with whom I spoke were testimony to the repeated harassment and bombardment they had received from southern Lebanon.

We did achieve in that cease-fire a goal, but it was limited. When the cease-fire ended, tragically, once again, an all-out war began in that area.

Today at 6 o'clock this morning Beirut time; midnight eastern standard time; 11 p.m. last night, Chicago time—a cease-fire went into effect, to halt the current fighting.

Many vehicles are being employed to obtain these goals.

The presence of the American marines as part of the Multinational Force in Beirut is one and only one of these vehicles.

The first component of the administration's strategy is to promote Lebanese national reconciliation. Important steps have been taken in that direction. On August 31, President Gemayel called for a national reconciliation meeting. Yesterday, a cease-fire was announced and Lebanese leaders agreed to a meeting in Saudi Arabia. We must not delude ourselves. Resolving Lebanese differences will not be easy or without setbacks; nevertheless, steps are being taken in the right direction.

We must also support the legitimate Government of Lebanon. President Gemayel was elected last year by 77 of 92 members of Parliament. A majority of both Muslims and Christian Deputies supported him and continue to do so.

We must support President Gemayel's efforts to rebuild national institutions. Most important of these institutions is the Lebanese Army. In 9 months considerable progress has been made in reconstituting a truly national military force which is half Muslim and half Christian. Not all of the problems have been resolved; nevertheless, multiconfessional units have fought well for the national interest of Lebanon. Those who attack the Army are seriously damaging the future of Lebanon. We have helped train and equip this force and we will continue to do so.

The role of the marines: Let us get clearly fixed in mind what the role of the marines is, as expressed to us in the Foreign Relations Committee by Marine Corps Commandant Paul X. Kelley, an absolutely outstanding leader in our military forces, a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. His remarks were buttressed by former marine captain, Secretary of State Shultz.

That is an unusual situation, when we have sitting side by side as witnesses two marines, one preparing to defend this country in the event of war and the other spending his entire time trying to find ways to establish peaceful conditions for this country. The role of the marines, as described by them, indicates that the Multinational Force including our marines are one element being used to advance American policy objectives. They are in Lebanon to provide a measure of stability while the Lebanese Government builds a national consensus and continues the process of rebuilding the national army. They are a demonstration of our support to the people of Lebanon.

Mr. President, I have joined the majority leader in supporting the joint resolution that is before us, authorizing continued participation of U.S. forces in the multinational force in Lebanon.

Its principal elements are the following, and I believe they bear repeating so that this RECORD can be complete.

First, a congressional determination that our marines have been involved in actual or imminent hostilities since August 29, as contemplated by section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution.

Second, an 18-month authorization for the continuation of American participation as required by section 5(b) of war powers, which is limited to the current mandate of the multinational force as set forth in the original September 25 agreement but also recognizes the need for defensive actions to protect the force itself.

Third, a commitment to continuing review of the situation during the interim, to be facilitated by periodic reports from the President, which may lead to possible future amendments of the original authorization.

Mr. President, attention will no doubt be focused on the 18-month duration of this authorization. I, myself, would perfer not to have a specified time limitation in this authorization. I have heard it said by some Members that they fear such an authorization will be taken as a blank check for our military involvement over an extensive period. The press has even referred to analogies with the Tonkin Gulf resolution of 1964.

Mr. President, I think such analogies are simply not well-founded. First, this authorization is keyed to the limited mandate of the multinational force as set out in the agreements last year. Let me quote from Ambassador Dillon's letter of September 25 on behalf of the U.S. Government. Our commitment was:

To deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1,200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

The further stipulations in the Lebanese Foreign Minister's letter also include the understanding that—

The American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense.

Mr. President, I fully recognize that the Senate and the House will want to discuss our understanding of these terms and conditions, and some of the uncertainties which are undoubtedly present in implementing the language on protective measures. However, I think all Members will have to agree that this authorization is not an open-ended blank check.

Second, there is already in law a provision of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act which effectively places a lid on the level of U.S. involvement. It requires that any substantial expansion in the number or role in Lebanon of U.S. Armed Forces would require a further authorization. That requirement is not affected by the resolution being introduced today and would continue to apply. The President has said that he does not seek to go beyond the present level of U.S. involvement in any case.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to emphasize that in providing an authorization for an 18-month period, we are not simply dropping out of the picture until the spring of 1985. The resolution itself provides for continuing reporting and consultations to assure that we will follow the situation carefully. We may, at some point, want to consider amendments to this authorization if the circumstances should justify it. That is why I would prefer no deadlines for such an authorization, because they have a tendency to confuse the ongoing nature of our responsibilities. But I support the basic elements of this authorization and I think it deserves the support of my colleagues in the Senate.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two editorials in support of this resolution in the Washington Post this morning and an excerpt from the New Republic, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 26, 1983]

STRENGTHENING THE AMERICAN HAND

Is the compromise resolution of the Marines in Lebanon in trouble in Congress? Possibly. Last Tuesday, the administration and the congressional leadership of both parties accepted a compromise initially proposed by Speaker O'Neill: Congress would pass a joint resolution asserting that the War Powers Act applies, but also authorizing the president to continue deploying the Marines in Lebanon as part of a multinational force for another 18 months. On Wednesday the House Appropriations Committee—normally prone to accept executive leadership in foreign policy—voted 20-16 to cut off funding for the Marines in Lebanon unless the president certifies by Dec. 1 that the War Powers Act applies—a certification that would give him 60 more days to get Congress to approve the deployment. On Thursday the House Foreign Affairs Committee approved the O'Neill resolution by a 30-6 vote, and on Friday its Senate counterpart, after some vote switching, did the same by a 9-7 margin. What is going on?

Everyone expects the Republican Senate ultimately to approve the resolution. The question is what the Democratic House will do when the resolution comes to the floor ths week. The speaker will likely allow votes on amendments, and, while most people expect the leadership to prevail, some respected legislators favor the Appropriations Committee result.

Many members are uneasy. They would like the president to acknowledge more explicitly the legitimacy of Congress' role. Some want to put pressure on him to withdraw the Marines soon. Some believe that any set period, long or short, is dangerous because it might give one or another of the Lebanese parties an incentive to refuse to reach agreement; by delaying invoking of the War Powers Act until Dec. 1, they hope to give the president a chance to move the parties to agreement without setting any specific deadline now. The monkey of responsibility in any case would remain on the president's back. But could Congress, when the 60-day deadline starts Dec. 1, set conditions or promote discussions any more deftly than it can now?

We think the approach of the leadership compromise is better. It does invoke the War Powers Act. It forces Congress—including the Democratic House—to join the president in taking responsibility for a policy about which everyone has qualms but for which few have a palatable alternative. No one so far has come forward with a resolution calling for withdrawal of the Marines now. The danger is that the House will indulge too far the politician's instinct for compromise by cutting the 18-month leeway period to six or nine months. This would weaken, rather than strength, the American hand in negotiations, and could involve Congress in a series of fractious disputes over a policy that most members, if they had to take the responsibility directly, would almost surely support.

[From the New Republic, Oct. 10, 1983]

• • • the compromise resolution hammered on by the White House and congressional leaders on September 20 (is) such a gratifying development. We may not be back to the days of Vandenberg, but we're far beyond Vietnam. The proposed joint resolution will authorize U.S. participation in the multinational force for eighteen months (i.e., beyond the 1984 election). At the same time it will allow the branches of government to disagree on the constitutional issue: the resolution invokes the War Powers Act, but the President, by expressing reservations about his part of the resolution, has reserved the right to challenge the Act in the future court battles. The compromise resolution wisely rejects calls for a more rigid time limit. To declare that the Marines would have to withdraw in three or six or eight months, as some members of Congress are urging, would be a disaster. Better to withdraw tomorrow. Such a resolution would be a telegram to Damascus telling it that for the next three or six or eight months it can lob shells at a leisurely pace into Marine positions, after which it can march into Beirut. The purpose of an American commitment is to ensure the survival of the Lebanese government. Telling those who wish to destroy that government that the United States will be gone in a few months will simply undermine our objective, demoralize the Lebanese Army, and increase the danger to American troops. It may turn out that in the end U.S. Marines cannot protect the Lebanese government. It may be too costly and too difficult. Mr. Gemayel and his army may be too weak. A withdrawal can always be made, but to declare one preemptively now is to doom the enterprise from the start.

It is Lebanon's misfortune to be situated where it is in the Middle East. There is little that the United States can do about that. But it is good that Congress and the President seem ready to work together to try to save a weak and worthy friend.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I would like to point out to my respected colleagues in the Senate that the Senate version of this resolution differs from the House version in two respects.

Two amendments by Senator MATHIAS were offered and the committee accepted those amendments with the support of the majority leader.

I would earnestly request Chairman ZABLOCKI and members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, as they consider this legislation on the floor, to take this into account so that we can avoid a time-consuming conference if they would accept these two amendments.

Also, they had an amendment that was different than ours. This amendment took into account the differing circumstances that might result if the British, Italian, and French members of the multinational forces withdrew. Such an action would put our forces in an entirely different position, and I will offer, at an appropriate time, an amendment to this effect in order to update our resolution and use the same wording as the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

So with those two provisions I put the Senate on notice and the House of Representatives that we would hope that there could be appropriate action.

I do feel that special attention should be given to the editorial from the Washington Post this morning and its conclusion. The article is entitled "Strengthening the American Hand," and the editorial board of the Washington Post concluded:

We think the approach of the leadership compromise is better. It does invoke the War Powers Act. It forces Congress—including the Democratic House—to join the president in taking responsibility for a policy about which everyone has qualms but for which few have a palatable alternative. No one so far has come forward with a resolution calling for withdrawal of the Marines now. The danger is that the House will indulge too far the politician's instinct for compromise by cutting the 18-month leeway period to six or nine months. This would weaken, rather than strengthen, the American hand in negotiations, and could involve Congress in a series of fractious disputes over a policy that most members, if they had to take the responsibility directly, would almost surely support.

We now have a new situation. We might have had some doubts in some minds, if the events of the weekend had not transpired, that we were involving ourselves in a quagmire for which the end could not be seen and that it would do nothing but escalate and escalate and get worse and worse every single day, and they would be voting for a "pig in a poke," so to speak. We have been working for days, and really for weeks, on a cease-fire.

There have been effective cease-fires before in Lebanon. Our aim was to have now another even more effective and more necessary cease-fire.

The good offices of Saudi Arabia were sought by our administration, and Prince Bandar, the newly appointed and highly influential, articulate, and intelligent Ambassador to the United States from Saudi Arabia has been personally devoting a tremendous amount of attention and thought to this, as have our own representatives. They include Ambassador Robert McFarland from the National Security Council and Ambassador Richard Fairbanks and, of course, Secretary Shultz, Deputy Secretary Ken Dam, and others, and, of course, the President of the United States, who has given this matter a great deal of serious thought.

It was our Government's feeling that a cease-fire was essential as a step toward political reconciliation in Lebanon. The cease-fire and the announcement that a national reconciliation meeting will occur offers any doubting Thomas an opportunity to say they now are voting on a resolution that has a far greater chance of success.

I would like to read a few extracts from an article in this morning's Washington Post, as follows:

Earlier this month when Israel withdrew its forces from the Chouf to new positions in southern Lebanon, a vicious cycle of new fighting broke out in the Chouf and in Beirut, with the Syrians arming and encouraging the Druze and other groups like the Shiite Moslems to attack the Lebanese army.

As one U.S. official put it, "Assad believed the Gemayel government would fold, and he could just walk down the Damascus-Beirut highway behind his surrogates to take control." According to U.S. officials, a key element in the Syrian strategy was to instigate attacks on the Marines in the hope that domestic pressure would force Reagan to pull them out and rob Gemayel of U.S. support.

But, despite misgivings in Congress over Marine casualties, the officials said it has been made clear to Syria that the Marines will not be withdrawn and that the United States is prepared to use the massive firepower it has arrayed off the Lebanese coast in carefully calibrated responses to attacks against the Marines.

In addition, the officials stressed, the Lebanese army, benefiting from months of intensive training by U.S. advisers, proved able in the past month's fighting to withstand fierce Druze assaults, aided by Syrian arms and Syrian-influenced Palestinian fighters, and to keep control of the perimeters around Beirut.

And I go on to quote from another section of the same story:

Shultz said, however, that Druze leaders participated in negotiations leading to the cease-fire.

Asked what had been the key to the cease-fire, an on-and-off proposition for more than a week, Shultz replied:

"The key must have been the sense that people in the community had that further bloodshed and fighting was not going to be productive and that the time for national reconciliation had really come."

In the last two weeks, the administration has stepped up pressure for a cease-fire as congressional and public concern mounted over increased involvement of the Marines in the spreading civil war in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles by John Goshko in the Washington Post and Bernard Gwertzman of the New York Times be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SYRIA DISCERNED NEW RISK, U.S. SAYS

(By John M. Goshko)

U.S. officials yesterday gave credit for the Lebanese cease-fire to Syria's realization that it cannot keep agitating the civil war there without increasing its military involvement to the point where it would risk direct clashes with the United States and possibly provide a new war with Israel.

Specifically, the officials said, Syria's hopes of winning control in Lebanon through its support of dissident forces fighting President Amin Gemayel's government had been thwarted by President Reagan's determination not to remove U.S. Marines from Beirut and by the unexpectedly strong showing of the Lebanese army during bitter fighting in the Beirut area. That, the officials continued, has created a military stalemate that Syrian President Hafez Assad could not break unless he increased his aid to the Druze militia and other dissident groups by throwing Syrian forces directly into the fighting.

But that would mean confrontation with the American, British, French, and Italian units forming the multinational force in Beirut and, even more threatening to Assad, force Israel to consider whether it has to go to war again to prevent Syria from gaining control over Lebanon.

For these reasons, the officials said, the Syrians apparently have decided to put aside the military option, at least for the moment, and try to win greater Syrian influence in Lebanese affairs through a process of political negotiation between Gemayel and the Syrian-backed factions in the Lebanese civil war.

The officials, echoing the caution expressed publicly yesterday by President Reagan and his senior advisers, acknowledged that the cease-fire is a very fragile achievement that could unravel into renewed fighting, especially if there is not quick movement toward the negotiations on "national reconciliation."

As Reagan said yesterday in New York, the cease-fire accord is only "a first step" and there still is "a long way to go" in solving the bitter religious and political feuds that have plaqued Lebanon with warfare for a decade and that threaten to dismember the country into antagonistic, foreign-dominated enclaves.

The officials, who declined to be identified, noted that, as of late yesteday, Beirut was still the scene of fighting.

They expressed skepticism about the cease-fire going into effect on schedule at 6 a.m. today in Beirut (midnight EDT). Even Reagan, in announcing the accord, pointedly told reporters. "You see my fingers are crossed."

The president's caution underscored how much the intractability of Middle East tensions has caused him to lower his expectations since Sept. 1, 1982, when he went on national television to announce an ambitious plan for resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In the ensuing 13 months, the Reagan initiative has not been realized and his bold blueprint for Mideast peace has shrunk to what has looked like a desperate effort to keep a military toehold in Beirut on behalf of a Lebanese government whose authority barely extends beyond the city limits.

Still, Reagan administration officials insisted yesterday that, with luck and skill, the cease-fire agreement could mark a turning point in U.S. efforts to put Lebanon back on the road to stability and allow a renewed attempt to tackle the larger problems of the region.

They said a cease-fire covering both the Beirut area and the nearby Chouf region, where Druze and Christian militias have been battling each other, is the necessary first step in implementing the diplomatic strategy that has been pusued for the past month by Reagan's special Mideast envoy, Robert C. McFarlane, with the aid of Saudi Arabia's ambassador-designate to the United States, Prince Bandar bin Sultan.

That strategy centers on inducing Syria to stop obstructionist activities inside Lebanon and cooperate in patching together an accord that will satisfy the political aspirations of the various contesting factions, allow Gemayel to extend his government's authority throughout the country and permit the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces occupying large portions of Lebanon.

The administration had hoped that it was on the way to achieving that objective in May when Secretary of State George P. Shultz helped to work out an agreement for Israeli withdrawal.

But that effort was derailed when Syria, which earlier had led the United States to expect its cooperation, rejected the accord and began agitating Druze and certain Moslem factions to oppose Gemayel's Christian dominated government.

Earlier this month when Israel withdrew its forces from the Chouf to new positions in southern Lebanon, a vicious cycle of new fighting broke out in the Chouf and in Beirut, with the Syrians arming and encouraging the Druze and other groups like the Shiite Moslems to attack the Lebanese army.

As one U.S. official put it, "Assad believed the Gemayel government would fold, and he could just walk down the Damascus-Beirut highway behind his surrogates to take control." According to U.S. officials, a key element in the Syrian strategy was to instigate attacks on the Marines in the hope that domestic pressure would force Reagan to pull them out and rob Gemayel of U.S. support.

But, despite misgivings in Congress over Marine casualties, the officials said it has been made clear to Syria that the Marines will not be withdrawn and that the United States is prepared to use the massive firepower it has arrayed off the Lebanese coast in carefully calibrated responses to attacks against the Marines.

In addition, the officials stressed, the Lebanese army, benefiting from months of intensive training by U.S. advisers, proved able in the past month's fighting to withstand fierce Druze assaults, aided by Syrian arms and Syrian-influenced Palestinian fighters, and to keep control of the perimeters around Beirut.

Using these factors as ammunition, the officials said, McFarlane and Bandar emphasized to Syria that to stay with its military approach eventually might mean fighting the multinational force and possibly persuading Israel to send its forces north again for a confrontation that Syria would lose.

At the same time, McFarlane argued that Syria had an alternative in the "national reconciliation dialogue" offered by Gemayel to his foes.

The object would be to restructure the Lebanese political system to give more power to the disaffected Moslem and Druze factions.

With this as a vehicle, Syria, through its ties to these groups and its proposed role as a mediator in the talks, could seek to regain its former political and economic influence in Lebanon.

"It was a chipping away process aimed at convincing the Syrians they stand to gain more and safeguard what they see as their interests in Lebanon by talking instead of shooting," one oficial said last night. "We're still not sure if it will go that way, but the cease-fire agreement is at least an encouraging sign that they're at least willing to give it a try."

CEASE-FIRE ACCORD GAINED IN LEBANON WITH SAUDIS' HELP

(By Bernard Gwertzman)

The United States said yesterday that it regarded the announcement of a cease-fire in Lebanon as only "a first step" toward the more difficult goals of bringing about a strong central government in that country and the withdrawal of all Israeli, Syrian and Palestinian forces.

In New York, speaking to reporters at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel after the cease-fire announcement in Damascus, Secretary of State George P. Shultz said he and President Reagan viewed the expected halt in the fighting as the start "of an important process."

He said the objectives of President Reagan and President Amin Gemayel of Lebanon "remain unchanged, in wanting to see the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, the emergence of a strong central government of Lebanon, based of course on national reconciliation." In addition, he said the United States remained committed to insuring that any final settlement in Lebanon provides "appropriate security arrangements" along Israel's northern borders.

ROLE OF MARINES UNCHANGED

As to the 1,600 American marines in Lebanon, Mr. Shultz indicated no change in their disposition at this time. He said their mission "remains important and remains unchanged." He added, "I think, however, they'll be a little more comfortable in carrying that mission out because they won't be subject to the crossfire that they have been in."

Mr. Shultz hinted that the large naval task force off Lebanon might be moved back if the cease-fire held. He seemed to draw attention to a call for restraint from damascus, where the cease-fire was announced, suggesting that the United States might take steps to show military restraint.

Mr. Reagan and Mr. Shultz were in New York for Mr. Reagan's appearance before the United States National General Assembly session this morning. First reports of a breakthrough in the prolonged efforts by the special American Middle East envoy, Robert C. McFarlane, and Prince Bandar, the Saudi Arabian intermediary, reached the President as he was about to leave Washington yesterday morning.

REAGAN ON PHONE TO GEMAYEL

At a luncheon yesterday with the United Nations Secretary General, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, Mr. Reagan spoke by phone with President Gemayel and congratulated him on the expected cease-fire. When reporters later asked him about the news reports of a truce, Mr. Reagan crossed his fingers and said, "It is a first step, and you see my fingers crossed."

"It is the beginning, of course, and the cease-fire will be announced, or has been announced, and now they can get down to the real business of settling the issues, and, we hope, bringing about peace and the solution to the Lebanese problems."

Mr. Reagan said, "We are all very happy for this first step that has come about, and I'm not going to make any projections or predications."

"There is still a long road to go in settling many of the issues there," he added.

Out of deference to the Lebanese President, Mr. Shultz said details of the cease-fire arrangement should come from Mr. Gemayel. But he did say the truce would be supervised by "neutral observers." He said that so far the exact composition of that group had not been agreed upon, but he noted there were "trained United Nations observers" in the Beirut area who were willing to take on the assignment.

SOME OF THE PRESSURE LIFTED

The cease-fire agreement was expected to remove some of the pressure on the Administration from members of Congress who have been alarmed over the casualties suffered by the Marine Corps in the last month. The casualties led to the move in Congress for a resolution, based on the War Powers Act, to limit the stay of the marines to another 18 months. They have already been there for a year.

Mr. Reagan has agreed to sign the resolution, which may be passed this week, but Mr. Shultz has stressed that the Administration did not feel bound by any specific limitations. Mr. Shultz said on Saturday that the marines should remain in Lebanon until stability was achieved in Lebanon, and he defined stability as including the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

The United States has also been under pressure from its allies in the multinational force in Lebanon—Britain, France and Italy—to work out a solution that would end the fighting which had been growing in intensity. The announcement yesterday should ease that problem, officials said.

When asked what produced the cease-fire announcement after so many false starts in recent weeks, Mr. Shultz said:

"The key must have been the sense that people in the community had that further bloodshed and fighting was not going to be productive and the time for national reconciliation had really come."

A reporter noted that there had been many cease-fires in Lebanon in the past that had broken down, and asked Mr. Shultz whether there was any reason to be any more optimistic this time.

"I can't make a confident prediction," he replied, "in the sense of being able to see into the future, but there has been a great deal of turmoil, people have suffered greatly, both in terms of people killed and people wounded and opportunities foregone."

"And the urge for peace and reconciliation and getting on with the task of economic reconstruction is very great in Lebanon and I can testify to that myself very personally from the many contacts I have had with Lebanese people," he said. Mr. Shultz visited Lebanon as part of two Middle East trips in April-May and in July.

American officials said privately that if the cease-fire held, the main American goal would be to get the most representative Lebanese government possible so that a concerted effort could be made to bring pressure on the Syrians to follow the lead of the Israelis and agree to withdraw from Lebanon.

They said this remained a very difficult task, given Syria's strong opposition to the Isareli-Lebanese accord of last May, worked out by Mr. Shultz, and Syria's traditional efforts to maintain power in Lebanon.

Mr. McFarlane, in fact, was sent to the Middle East in early August as the replacement for Philip C. Habib with the object of trying to promote a Syrian withdrawal. But his mission was quickly transformed into one of serving as a mediator among the various Lebanese factions and the Syrians, once fighting broke out in connection with Israel's decision to withdraw some of its troops from the Shuf Mountains.

The Lebanese Army and the Druse, who are backed by Syria, fought to take over positions vacated by Israel, with the fiercest fighting over Suk al Gharb, which was captured by the army and held against repeated efforts by the Druse to take it.

American officials said a major positive development from the last month of hectic diplomacy was the decision of King Fahd of Saudi Arabia to cooperate openly with the United States in the cease-fire efforts. Although Mr. McFarlane was described by American officials as being the driving force, it had been important for Prince Bandar of Saudi Arabia to be involved to make it easier for the Syrians to accept the cease-fire arrangements.

Mr. PERCY. Needless to say, the recent events are a dramatic illustration of what diplomacy, tenacity, and persistence can do in preventing more fighting. What may have appeared as a warlike act turns out to be the best act for peace.

We understandably, in the world's view, stood and defended our marines. We took as few casualties as possible. But we let it be known that unless the fighting stopped, we were prepared to keep that peacekeeping force in Lebanon; we were prepared to stand side by side with other nations of the Multinational Forces. We were prepared to be there and to be counted. We were prepared to accomplish our goals and not be limited to 6 weeks or 6 months. We were prepared to stay 18 months and, if necessary, longer to see that the foreign policy objectives, clearly outlined, as I said in my opening comments, by the President, the Secretary of State, and other officials in the administration could be carried out.

I think our will is what our adversaries were testing. We had the will. They saw it and they decided to sign a cease-fire. Without that kind of backup, support, and effort, we could not achieve what we are achieving.

None of us can predict with any accuracy how long this cease-fire will last. All we can do is say today the Mideast is a safer place than it was yesterday; today, our marines are in a much safer position than they were. Each day must show progress.

After all, this is an area that has been in turmoil for centuries. This is an area where religion has been the cause for war after war. In the name of God, inhumanity has wreaked on man and woman. We say, "Let's end this. Let's find a route to peace."

The first bold creative steps were taken by Prime Minister Begin and President Sadat. None of us who were in the East Room of the White House the night that they came down from Camp David—that glorious Sunday night—can forget it. They embraced each other and we in turn embraced a weeping Prime Minister Begin and a weeping President Sadat of Egypt—weeping possibly with hope that had continued for years, the bitterness between these two countries was at an end.

No one could say it would be permanent. There have been setbacks. The hopes for commercially open borders have never been realized. The Egyptian Ambassador to Israel has been withdrawn. These setbacks must be reversed and the search for peace resumed. President Mubarak is coming here. We hope to sit down with him and discuss with him the future of the peace process.

I was reminded of the opera, Aida, which I saw again on Friday at the Lyric Opera. This opera is a reminder of the glories of Egypt that passed and the challenge of the Egypt of the future.

The future hope is that somehow, in some way, the Egyptians can live better than their fathers and their forefathers and can live in peace. I share that hope. And I am certain it will never leave Foreign Minister Shamir if he is confirmed as the Prime Minister by the Knesset of Israel. Certainly no Nation on earth has paid a greater price in war than Israel. No nation on earth has faced greater challenges since its birth, than has Israel.

One of Israel's four Arabs neighbors has signed a peace treaty. The second, Lebanon, has signed an agreement that has yet to be implemented and can only be fully implemented with the withdrawal of all foreign forces—those of Syria, the Palestinians, and of Israel itself.

When the Lebanon question is settled, it is my hope that we can then approach King Hussein and say,

Your Majesty, the opportunity how exists for you to bring peace at long last to your beleaguered nation, to sit down face to face with the Prime Minister of Israel, and to work out, and develop, and create the conditions that would resolve Arab-Israeli issues, including the future of the Palestinians.

To do so, you must recognize Israel's right to exist behind definable and defendable borders and the right of its people to live in peace.

That will give peace to Jordan. It will remove a threat from Jordan. It will give peace that is essential to future generations of Arabs and Israelis. Peace in the Middle East is part of what is at stake in Lebanon.

In the specific Lebanon situation we are striving to find and define a relationship with the President through the War Powers Act. I hope we can, in true partnership, join with the President, not invading his prerogative as Commander in Chief, not trying to become the executive branch of Government, but reaffirming the Constitution which says that only Congress can declare war.

We share that responsibility with the President and do so in a spirit of comity, not of confrontation, of fellowship and a desire to work together with this administration in resolving this important issue.

I have been proud of the steps the President has taken to bring peace to the Middle East.

I trust that the Syrians will recognize they are the fourth element of this jigsaw puzzle that must come together to bring peace to the Middle East. They have no advantage in becoming more and more dependent upon the Soviet Union. With the Lebanon cease fire they have said, in effect, "We will observe this cease fire. We will find a way to cease the senseless killing and see if we cannot, through negotiation, resolve this problem."

If they have any hope of getting the Golan Heights back, this is the road. If they ever want to rebuild some of those devastated towns in Syria, this is the way to do it. If they ever wish to have the esteem and respect of their fellow Arabs, as well as the world, this is the route they should follow.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I thank my colleague and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee for his statement.

He mentioned at the outset that this is an historic occasion. It is my sincere desire that the Senate will be capable of living up to this historic occasion. The U.S. Senate, on occasion, over its past nearly 200-year history has sometimes not risen to the occasion. I hope this debate will be one of those instances in which we, as a body, rise to the level of the historical occasion we are representing it to be.

This is the first time the Senate has debated a war powers resolution authorizing the commitment of troops under the War Power Act. It is my fear we are not going to debate the war powers resolution; that we are going to debate policy in Lebanon and not the war powers resolution.

I assume, when the Senator from Illinois and other Senators have said, off the floor, that this is an historic occasion, they are referring not to the fact that there are momentous events in the Middle East, particularly in Lebanon, where we have witnessed similar events that have been equally historic, unfortunately, and, unfortunately, I suspect, we will witness further developments in the Middle East which could be characterized as historical at that moment.

One should assume the historic significance of this debate, whether or not this is an historic debate. I believe it was Professor Corwin who said that the Constitution is little more than an invitation for the Executive and the Congress to do battle over the formulation of foreign policy. So, the historic event was that the U.S. Congress codified that relationship with the War Powers Act.

Now, there is a question I must acknowledge about the constitutionality of the War Powers Act. There is a question of the impact of the Supreme Court's decision on congressional vetoes on the War Powers Act. There is a question about the impact of the separability provision, but I am fearful that we are not going to debate that at all. I am fearful that the debate will be caught up in another important issue, what should the policy of this Government be in Lebanon?

Quite frankly, many of us thought that this debate on the War Powers Act should have occurred a year ago when the Marines first went into Lebanon to supervise the PLO withdrawal, or when they were reintroduced "temporarily" as an "interposition force" in the "Beirut area" with "no intention or expectation that they would become involved in hostilities."

Those are quotations from the President of the United States of America.

Some of us thought, at that point, we should have debated the applicability of the War Powers Act. Some of us argued that our Marines were in jeopardy; that this was an area of hostility; that notwithstanding the fact that a government which has all my best wishes to succeed invited us—some of us thought that that did not in any way alleviate the prospect of hostilities because it was a government that did not control all of its own country. So its invitation could not carry with it any assurance, even remote assurance, that it would be able to prevent hostilities from occurring.

That is why we were there, to help that government.

It was then an agonizing dilemma of whether we withdraw those troops or defend them, our troops, by introducing an even greater force.

Now the evidence of hostilities is, I think, clear and unmistakable. Four marines have died within the past month; more than 30 have been wounded; we have increased our troop presence in Beirut by one-third; U.S. ships and aircraft have attacked suspected enemy positions; we have offered a protective umbrella for our multinational-force partners and perhaps even for the Lebanese Army, and with the deployment of the carrier, Eisenhower, the giant assault ship Tarawa, with 2,000 marines on board, and a battleship called the New Jersey, we have the capacity, though not the intention, to wage a much wider war.

Unfortunately, my concern is that the action that we take this week may be totally irrelevant. The administration is seeking the congressional stamp of approval, which I think is a worthwhile objective—because I hope what we have learned from our encounters in Southeast Asia is that a foreign policy, absent the consent of the governed, is not likely to last very long, so it is best to get as many people on board at the outset—the administration wants our stamp of approval and is, interesting enough, unwilling to commit itself to our laws. Thus it does not really matter, in my humble view, whether or not the legislation which the distinguished Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, and the majority leader, Senator BAKER, propose if the legislation carries with a time limit of 18 months, 20 months, 24 months, or any other duration.

The administration, in fact, has indicated that it does not plan on abiding by it. They say they are not bound by it, and that they can, in fact, exercise independent judgment that they should stay longer if need be.

The way I look at that is it is asking the Congress to jump in on the commitment. They want us as partners in the front end but are not looking for that partnership at the other end, at the tail end.

This administration is embarked on an open-ended commitment in support of—this, I think, is the key to the dilemma—what I would characterize, notwithstanding the articulate statement by the Senator from Illinois, as very vaguely defined objectives, which are highly uncertain in terms of their achievability.

For example, Mr. President, if I may paraphrase the Senator, I believe he said that there are clear policy objectives. He is right. The policy objectives are, No. 1, that there should be permanent cessation of hostilities;

The second one is that there should be a central government which has control of Lebanon throughout Lebanon;

Third, there should be withdrawal of all troops from Lebanon;

Fourth, that there be control by the Gemayel government, that is, the central government; and

Fifth, that conditions be established so that Israel's foreign border is not in jeopardy. Those are laudable objectives

My question is, which I have asked of everybody in the committee, and I shall ask of anybody who will listen to me, is this: Is the presence of the military force of the United States of America in Lebanon and its continued presence conditioned upon the accomplishment of these goals? Is that the policy objective? If, in fact, there is not withdrawal of all troops; if, in fact, the Gemayel government is not able, in 18 months, to exercise its control over all of Lebanon; if, in fact, there is not a permanent cessation of hostilities, does that mean that the objective has not been met? Does that mean the Marines will stay there until that occurs?

That seems to me, Mr. President, to be a fairly vague definition.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. Surely.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator's statement, but I would like to ask the Senator from Delaware, because I was not able to be present at the hearings or the meetings of the Committee on Foreign Relations: These objectives he is referring to, are those specific objectives that the President sent to us and said this is his reason for why we are there? Or are these objectives that are part of this resolution that have come from the committee?

The reason I am asking is that my understanding is that under the War Powers Act, once the days are triggered, the President is supposed to submit in writing to the Congress what he says the purposes are, then we start a debate as to whether those purposes are valid or not. Is this his set of objectives, or is this something that whoever were the framers of this resolution have put together? I just wanted to find out.

Mr. BIDEN. The answer is, a little of both. Technically, these are the Congress determination of what we believe his objectives are. We say, in the joint resolution's finding and purpose, section 2: "The Congress finds that." Then we go on to suggest removal of all forces from Lebanon is essential in order to restore full control, and so forth—all the things I just named.

In fairness to the administration, they sent up to the Congress the Secretary of State, who told the Congress what the objectives are. Under the leadership of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Tennessee, they wrote down on a piece of paper what they were told by this administration, and we were all told by the administration, were their objectives. The problem is, since the War Powers Act was not triggered or not agreed to have been triggered by the administration, the administration has not officially reported to us as to what the objectives are.

I might make a point here of what I am trying to drive at. I would argue that there is a distinction between objective and mission. The objective, for example, of the U.S. foreign policy is that there be a free and open Poland. That is an objective; we would love that to occur. But the question to be asked is, Is the mission of the NATO forces stationed nearest Poland in West Germany to guarantee that there be a free and open Poland? I would suggest that that is probably not the mission. That requires affirmative action.

What I have been unable to get from anyone in the administration or anyone on the committee who supports this resolution is whether or not the objective and mission are synonymous. For if, in fact, the mission of the Marines is to guarantee that the objectives be met, then I would argue that we are in for a long haul that cannot be accomplished by 1,200 or 1,800 marines and we are buying a pig in a poke.

Notwithstanding the fact that my friend from Illinois is very, very positively impressed by the cease-fire—as I am—I would suggest that one cease-fire a peace does not make in the Middle East. So I would wonder whether or not, if the cease-fire breaks down and there are 40, or 400, or however many more marines killed, I wonder whether or not we are saying we will stay there.

One of the reasons why I am about to argue—and I shall yield for more questions—that the War Powers Act is the mechanism that should be triggered here is that the War Powers Act would require the President within 48 hours to come up and say: "Look, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, this is what I plan to do," with some specificity.

Mr. CHILES. That is exactly the question I really wanted to ask the Senator from Delaware: Had that been done?

Mr. BIDEN. No.

Mr. CHILES. If the response he gave me was the President's request in writing from him and that maybe this is what he wants or something, whether we are really debating on what the President said he saw the role and the mission of the troops is. That is my understanding of what the War Powers Act was to be about, not just for us to indulge ourselves but so that, really, the American people could understand what we were saying the purpose was, so marines and their mothers could understand what their purpose was in being there, and so we could have that kind of debate on the basis of exactly what the President felt that role and mission is. Is the Senator telling me that we are not going to have that kind of debate?

Mr. BIDEN. I am telling the Senator that we have people making representations on this floor as to what the President wants, but that, in fact, is not the same as having the debate on what the President specifically has sent up to us, in writing his intentions are in the region and what the nexus is between his objective and the presence of the troops. The fact of the matter is, my colleagues on both sides of the aisle and both Houses of Congress say to me on occasion: "Well, you know, JOE, if you go ahead and invoke the War Powers Act or if the President signed on to the War Powers Act, then he has only 60 days, and"—you have already heard the argument—"what will happen is that those who wish to see the marines leave and spoil things for Lebanon will in fact continue the pressure upon the United States of America by shelling the marines, building up support in America to bring the boys home, and they will not be willing to move along the road to negotiate in that 60-day interim; therefore, you must give them more time."

My response to that is that that may be true, but until we once invoke the War Powers Act, until we once demonstrate to the world that the mere fact that the War Powers Act has been invoked does not mean that it will follow therefrom that the troops will be withdrawn. Until that occurs, we are going to always be in the situation where we are beaten over the head by every administration that says 60 days is not enough time.

Obviously, 60 days is not enough time to do anything other than make clear to the folks, make clear to JOE BIDEN, make clear to me as one Senator: "What are you about, Mr. President? What is your game plan, Mr. President? And, Mr. President, I am willing to sign on based upon what I now know or I am not willing to sign on because I do not think it is capable of being accomplished."

Mr. CHILES. One of the problems I think we found in both Korea and Vietnam and one of the things I remember so vividly that I sort of said in my own determination after Vietnam was that I was not going to be willing to commit troops to another engagement unless we knew the rules in which they were going and we sort of knew when we could claim victory.

Can the Senator tell me when we would claim victory here?

Mr. BIDEN. I can only tell the Senator—and I honestly believe it—maybe the Senator from Illinois will listen to my response to this, because I do not want to misrepresent anybody's position, but in response to the Senator's question, I think a reasonable person, listening to the debate that has taken place in the Foreign Relations Committee, listening to the Marine Commandant, listening to the President of the United States on other occasions, and listening to the Secretary of State before the committee, would have to conclude that the only time in which, to use the phrase of the Senator from Florida, we can claim victory is when the four objectives are met. That is when in fact there is permanent cessation of hostilities, there is withdrawal of all foreign troops, there is de facto control of the country by central government, and Israel's northern border is secure.

Now, I would assume that if I were to interpret the objective as not having been met or anything short of the stated objective, a President would be able to come back to me and say: "LOOK, BIDEN, when you voted for that resolution, it was reasonable for you to understand, any reasonable person would have understood I was going to keep at it until all of those troops were out; I was going to keep at it until there was a central government in Lebanon that controlled all of Lebanon, and I was going to keep at it until Israel's northern border was secure."

That is what I would think he would have a right to say to me and to this Congress.

What do we say if, for example, 18 months from now, God forbid, the objectives have not been met? What do we say if, for example, 18 months from now Lebanon is like it has been for much of its tragic history? Do we say: "All right, you gave it a good try, now bring them home, now come back, now stop"?

Well, I do not know. I do not think that is the way we work in the Senate. I think the way we work, although the Senator was here a little before I was in the Senate—I was going to college and law school through that entire Vietnam era, and I observed a strange phenomenon, as we all did, in this country; that the more havoc that was caused by the enemy upon American boys the more it stiffened the resolve, understandably, of a number of Americans that started to ask the logical question: "Is this in vain? Did all these folks die for nothing? Are we now going to cut and run? My son died. My son lost his arm. Now you are telling me, John Q. Citizen, you are going to say come home? Why did my son die? What was the cause?"

And so I suspect, if this cease-fire does not last, if the objectives are not met, and there are more casualties over the next 18 months, when we rise on the floor and say: "Well, now it is time, we cannot reasonably reach that objective," there are going to be people, understandably, who are going to say; "No, we cannot just let that go all for naught."

The Senator from Florida has made a private resolve to himself. The Senator from Illinois made reference to his deep feelings about the issue of war and peace with regard to previous wars.

Well, this is, I guess, a purging of our souls. I also made a promise to myself, as we all do when we come here. One of those promises was that I was never going to do to a generation that followed me what I believe was done to my generation. I was never going to vote to send a woman or a man into a situation where their life was at stake with a vague statement of American policy, without the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government and its military behind it. I was not going to do that. And here I am on the floor of the Senate 11 years later, voting on what I would have to say, with all the good intentions of the sponsors, is a vague resolution, saying: "I am going to commit American forces. I do not know how long it is going to take. I am not quite sure what the objective is. I am not sure how many lives will have to be lost, and I promise you I am not going to go too far."

My view is that if in fact the President believes it is necessary to commit significant forces to clear out the mountains around Beirut, I would rather him say "do it" and I will support him. If the alternative is this resolution or going in there completely, I will say, "Go in."

Those are only two alternatives. We have a third reasonable alternative, which I will speak to in a moment. But if they are the only two alternatives, as one Senator, I am not buying on to incremental bleeding. That is not what I am signing on for. I think that is what we are doing. We are signing on to an incremental bleeding.

We have some of my liberal colleagues on my side saying one of the problems with the resolution is that it gives a blank check.

That is not my problem with the resolution. My problem with the resolution is that I do not know when we accomplish our end, what the definition of the end is. If in fact we decide to do it, I, like the Senator, suggest that we not have any time on it and we not put a limitation on the military. If the military says they need 50,000 troops, if we conclude we are going to sign on to the objective, then let us sign on. But I do not want to sit back and say our objective is as follows, and then the military says in order to accomplish that objective we have to increase our presence tenfold.

They have not said that yet. But if they said that, for us to sit here and say: "Now, wait a minute, we only said you could have 1,200 troops, we only said you could have this many troops," that is not the point as far as I am concerned. If we go in to accomplish the objective, I think we should sign on to go in.

Mr. PERCY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. For a question; yes, I yield.

Mr. PERCY. I would like to put a question to my distinguished colleague because we are in a sense dealing with that time-worn phrase "the real world." We are interested in responding to responsible people who say are these objectives worthy, do we have a chance to achieve them, and will what you are asking for in authority help us toward that goal?

Now, we know our ultimate goal differs from our goal for tomorrow. What we are doing is reaching in a sense for a star. We may never get it, but if we reach for it, we never will end up with a handful of mud.

What we set down were goals and objectives with which the Lebanese have thoroughly concurred. I do not know whether or not Syria concurs, but I think they know the commitment on the part of others.

We have an objective in the Camp David process, and it was scoffed at by some. But on balance, the Camp David process has led to what none of us believed in our lifetime we would ever see—a peace treaty signed between Egypt and Israel, an exchange of ambassadors, open borders, exchange of personnel, and removing the largest single Arab military ground force from the possibility of direct, head-on conflict with Israel, and a return of the Sinai over the vigorous objections. So we have accomplished something.

We saw two men, Begin and Sadat, awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Since then, we have been deteriorating. We have seen dashed hopes. But the Camp David spirit still exists. You will never turn the clock back to the dark days when we had no hope.

Here again, we are establishing these four goals that my distinguished colleague enunciated, they are goals; they are objectives. Maybe they cannot all be achieved in the immediate future. But they are worthy of trying to be achieved. You will notice that we did not even have a cease-fire in one of them, and we achieved a cease-fire. We do not know how long it will last. I think the administration has carefully worked out its goals and has sat down and consulted with the parties——

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, since this is on my time, does the Senator have a question?

Mr. PERCY. Are we on controlled time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time is being charged to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. BIDEN. I thought the Senator had a question. I have not finished my statement yet.

Mr. PERCY. My question is this: Are there any better goals or objectives? Is there any suggestion the Senator would make to the administration as to how it can improve the approach it is now taking?

Does not the Senator concur with the Senator from Illinois that it is probably better to have no timeframe and no limitations but it is the will of Congress and the will of the people that we do put some framework on there? Certainly, that itself serves a useful purpose, because it says to the Lebanese: "You don't have a blank check from the United States. You have limited time, limited forces, and you have to take over."

That does put pressure on them. The Lebanese have never had an army that could unify and bring stability and peace to their own country. Now they have that objective.

I would be rather reluctant to give them too much of a blank check and say, "We will stand there, and you can hold our coat while we do your battle."

We are saying, "You have to do the fighting. You have to bring this country together. We are there for a short period of time, relatively speaking—a year and a half—with a limited number of people to help you."

What better incentive can we have for them to do something about it—as they are doing it now—and not as the Vietnamese ended up doing—holding our coats while we carried the load with 600,000 combat troops?

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, if I may respond, and then finish my statement, the Senator makes the understandably fallacious argument of appealing to authority, once again, which has been made for so many years in this body, and that is that so many responsible people have suggested this course.

I respectfully suggest that so many responsible people suggested the course of our foreign policy through the decade of the 1960's and 1970's, which I do not think turned out to be all that sound. I also suggest that maybe our problem is that we are in Washington.

They are worthy objectives. All of the objectives stated are worthy objectives.

The next question that the Senator said we should be asking is, Do they have a chance of succeeding? I suggest that the chance of succeeding along the lines this administration is pursuing those objectives is less than even and that what we are doing is putting a relatively small force of marines in the untenable position of having, in fact, to attempt to achieve objectives which their size and scope and the extent of their authority limits their prospect of being able to do.

The Senator said, "What is our goal for tomorrow?" That is my question: What is our goal for tomorrow? What is tomorrow's goal? I have heard what the goal forever in Lebanon is: To have peace and tranquility, a central government, no foreign powers, and so forth. That, again, is a laudable goal. I do not disagree with the goal. But is it the mission of the marines to achieve that goal, and must they stay until that goal is achieved?

I think the resolution before us is flawed, constitutionally and practically. It tries to establish the applicability of the War Powers Act, when we already have foreknowledge that the President will disavow that act; and for the sake of harmony, it sidesteps the fundamental question. It is creating a regrettable precedent, in my view, and it asserts time limits which we know the President will not be bound by. He has already told us he will not be bound by them.

It pretends to limit our troops to a peacekeeping mission but permits such protective measures as may be necessary to insure their safety. It endorses our declared policy objectives, though we all know that no one really knows when they are going to be achieved or, in fact, if they will end up being achieved.

This resolution, in my view, does not back up our marines. It leaves them in grave uncertainty, because our policy is so ill defined that they cannot know what is really expected of them.

Because we are divided over that unclear policy and over the constitutional issue, we are not unified on the issue and, therefore, we are not unified behind them. Because the risks of that policy has been so minimized, they cannot be sure that we will stand fast if and when the situation worsens.

As a result, we sound a very uncertain trumpet while their lives are on the line.

The fact is that we still do not know what the objective is, what the mission is.

We get back to the resolution. The resolution is a resolution providing authority under the War Powers Act for continued U.S. participation in Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

The Senator from Illinois, when he gets his turn again, is going to tell me that the title does not control. If it does not control, why do we say that?

Are we saying that all foreign forces have to leave Lebanon before the Americans leave? If we do, we should tell the folks that. That is what we are signing on for. That is what we are telling the world we are signing on for.

That means, obviously, that Syria and Israel have a veto power over whether or not the marines leave—if that is what we are saying—and, I might add, the PLO.

The resolution states:

This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational force in Lebanon resolution."

The Senator says he is about to cure that deficiency. But what happens if the Multinational Force becomes the unilateral force? What happens if France, Italy, and England say they have had enough and they are going home? Do we go home?

The resolution says:

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

The Congress finds that—

Then they go through what the Senator from Illinois read:

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

This administration says it is not going to be bound by that, anyway.

Now, I do not quite understand again how we have such a clearly defined objective. The Senator from Maryland has just come to the floor. I hope when he speaks he is going to do as artfully here as he did in the committee, a comparison between what in fact real definitions of mission are and what is a lack of a mission in this legislation.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I have not finished my statement, unless he wants to speak to that point for a moment.

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator will yield at this point, I want to add another piece of evidence on this question of the mission and purpose of our forces as part of the Multinational Force. I think the Senator is absolutely on point in stressing that the mission of our troops has not been clearly defined and in fact is being expanded and broadened almost daily.

Now the Senator has quoted very effectively from the language of the resolution that is now before the Senate for approval. He quoted first the title which states that the participation in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon is in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon. Then he quoted the findings and purpose section of the joint resolution which states that in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force and that the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential U.S. foreign policy objective in the Middle East. I want to add three points to a newspaper report of an interview by the Secretary of State over the weekend with Cable News Network. This newspaper report in the Baltimore Sunday Sun this past Sunday said:

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior administration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows if the Syrians will ever agree to pull out."

Mr. Shultz's comments, which came in an interview over the Cable News Network, were likely to cause further concern in Congress because, as he did when he testified last Wednesday before two congressional committees, the secretary refused to guarantee that the marines now in Lebanon would be pulled out in 18 months or that the size of the contingent or the scope of its mission would not be expanded.

The article reporting on the interview later stated:

At one point in the interview, the secretary refused to provide details on the conditions for pulling out the approximately 5,500 American, British, French and Italian members of the multinational force. But under questioning, he added:

"We have to judge the situation, and we want to have the marines continue their mission, and the other multinational force elements continue their mission, in supporting the emergence of stability in Lebanon. If we can find a situation in Lebanon that has stability in it, in terms of the structure of the government and removal of foreign forces, that's the objective."

When asked if that meant it would not be possible to achieve "stability" without the removal of the foreign forces, he agreed, saying: "I think that if you have a country with, say, 75 percent or so occupied by foreign forces, it's hard to see how the government of that country has control of it, and has stability."

Then, and listen carefully as our role in Lebanon gets carried step by step further and further.

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational forces being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic position in Lebanon."

So that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn he is contemplating a further mission for the Multinational Force.

This is what we mean when we say the mission and purpose of this force has not been defined in a way that Congress can make a reasonable judgment about whether it makes sense, whether it is feasible, whether it is achievable, what the risks are, what the benefits are and whether we want to commit under those circumstances. The Senator has put his finger on an extremely important point. In fact our colleague, Senator NUNN, who was on "Meet The Press" on Sunday was questioned about our involvement there and made the point:

I do not believe we ought to be debating a time limit. I think we ought to be debating our role in Lebanon.

I think the Senator from Delaware has pinpointed the crucial issue very well and I commend the Senator. It is an extremely important point that is being discussed.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank the Senator and I hope he will develop it more.

Let me add that he was gracious in not going on and even reading further in that article. Where he left off it says:

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese.

I really admire the candor of the administration with the press. I wish they would be as candid with us. That is what we are looking for. We are trying to figure out what they are all about. They do not say as much to us. When you press them they say it is a limited role, and that it is only so many people.

I was eating lunch in the Senate dining room with several of my Republican colleagues who have a different ideological disposition on most issues than I and I said "I am worried that we are in there forever," and one Senator said to me "Oh, don't worry about that; wait until October of 1984, wait for the October surprise."

I want to know, and I want to make it clear to those marines that if we sign on to send them there we are signing on to stay with them. We are either going to be with them or not going to be with them. That is the generational argument I was trying to articulate before. We never knew before were you in or out. The only way you know you are in is, if that is the mission this administration has for our marines, then let him send it up to us within the context of the War

Powers Act. Let us debate it here on the floor of the Senate, and let us vote and let us be on record as to whether or not we support that mission.

We all line up and the likelihood is that if we all line up, we all sign on, we are likely to stay there. We are not going to have another generation that has the rug pulled out from under it when it is sitting there.

We are not going to then find that there is a majority on the floor of the Senate saying, "I didn't know you meant to do that, therefore cut off aid, cut off the money, cut off the appropriations."

You have to give them some security, some surety. If that is the mission let us make it the mission. A problem facing our marines is pretty well illustrated by a statement by one of the platoon commanders quoted in Sunday's Post. He said, "It is pretty hard to find out who is shooting at you. You have no idea who are the good guys and who are the bad guys. That is what I am trying to find out."

I want to make sure when that discussion takes place 2 months or 6 months or 18 months from now, in Lebanon among marines, they are not deciding whether we are the good guys or the bad guys, not just who is shooting at them but back here is the good guy and the bad guy, who is with them and who is against them, who signed on and who signed off. I do not see anything in this resolution that says that.

Now if every Senator who is going to vote for this resolution is saying, "Mr. President, we are signing on with you for 18 months, to accomplish the mission that you have cited as objectives, and we are not going to pull out on you, we are going to stick with you," then fine, wonderful.

I happen to think that would be a mistake. But, wonderful, we know what we are talking about then.

But, mark my words what is going to happen. People are going to sign on for the 18 months, which this resolution does, even though it has a review after 6 months, they are going to sign on for 18 months and then, God forbid, which I do not hope, if things get real bad, public pressure starts to build, these same folks who voted for that resolution are going to be on the floor of the U.S. Senate saying: "I didn't know it meant this. That ol' President, he is doing something he said he wasn't going to do. We didn't know it meant that. We only thought such and such."

And they will be able to say that because they can say, "I didn't know that was the military objective that we were signing onto."

The whole question before us, it seems to me, is, first and foremost, does the War Powers Act apply? The Senator from Illinois quoted or made reference to Camp David and talked about how that was a chance and a historical occasion. All true. Only one little difference: We did not send American troops to assure Camp David was accommodated. We did not do that. We are here. Again, a laudable objective, but we are sending American troops, I assume, to stay with it until the objective is accomplished.

I do not understand how we can, as we seem to be trying to do, disconnect the presence of the marines from the objective. If they are not there to meet these broad objectives, why are they there? And if they are there for that reason, does not the President need a broader grant of authority than we are giving him in order to accomplish those objectives?

The President of the United States, in an address to the Nation back on November 20, 1982, started off by saying:

> My fellow Americans, the scenes that the whole world witnessed this past weekend are among the most heart-rendering in the long nightmare of Lebanon's agony.

Then he went on to get to this phrase:

> Secretary Shultz, on my behalf, has also reiterated our views to the Government of Israel through its Ambassador in Washington.

Continuing to quote:

> Unless Israel moves quickly and courageously to withdraw, it will find itself ever more deeply involved in problems that are not of its own and which it cannot solve.

Now, I wonder why the President seemed so confident that we can solve the dilemma that has plagued Lebanon for centuries. In terms of U.S. national interests, to what degree is that interest jeopardized if, in fact, there is not a unified Lebanon? And if you assume that the objective, that we will have a significant diminution of our security interests in the region absent a united Lebanon, therefore, we must project force sufficiently to secure Lebanon, are we willing to go head to head and run the risk with that other superpower that is just across the line?

Mr. President, there are Soviet soldiers across the way—not 500, 5,000 or 8,000 miles away; they are miles away.

Now, what are we signing onto? Is it so important in our interests that we cannot have a situation that, in effect, is a situation where the Syrians are in the east, the Israelis in the south, and the Lebanese Government in the Beirut area while diplomacy works or attempts to make it work?

We are said to be protecting Israel's northern border. I thought Israel did a pretty good job of that all by itself. For the last 30 some years, we have not had to interdict any American Forces in the Middle East to protect Israel. They do a pretty credible job.

Why is it that we think that the American public and the world, that understandably was outraged when Israel was shelling Beirut and other population centers to get after the PLO and innocent civilians were being killed, why is it we think the world will not think that of us when the battleship New Jersey is firing off into the Shuf?

Do we think somehow we are going to be able to do it with great precision and only (a) the bad guys, who ever they are, and (b) military bad guy types are going to be hit? This notion that on paper seems so compelling and reasonable that all we have to do is put together a Government of Lebanon or allow one to blossom—which it will do if it only has time—and then, with a little bit of help from their friends, all the bad guys will leave and everybody will be in harmony, and, therefore, if that occurs, the Middle East is more secure and that in turn is positive in terms of United States interests and so on and so on and so on, all sounds reasonable. It is compelling, except it defies history. I do not see that happening in any short time.

And yet, we are going to nickle and dime, apparently, the Marines to death while we seek that goal in an incremental way that is designed to produce this unified Lebanon that, in fact, has a central government that is in control of all Lebanon, absent the presence of foreign forces, all foreign forces.

I do not know. It sounds very good. The President could have just as easily come up here and said, through his Secretary of State, "Our objective is to secure the Beirut area."—at least that would have been more circumscribed—and define what constitutes the Beirut area. But we are going a little bit further than that. We are not just waiting for this Gemayel government to get its wings, we want it to be able to fly at the top speed for which it has been rated, and that is fly over all of Lebanon, unite all of Lebanon.

And how long do we stay? How long does the multinational force stay? As I said, do we stay beyond what the rest of the multinational force stays?

Well, I think the mission in Lebanon is changing the same incremental way that the mission in Southeast Asia changed. In August of 1982, the Marines were deployed in Beirut for less than 3 weeks to help supervise the PLO withdrawals. Then on September 25, 1982, the Marines reentered Beirut according to the United States agreement with Lebanon "temporarily to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area." The United States "will facilitate restoration of the Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area."

And a U.S. Government statement said, "This agreement was to provide appropriate assistance to the GOL's (the Government of Lebanon's) efforts to restore order, safety, and control in Beirut."

Then on September 29, 4 days later, President Reagan informed Congress: The Marines' "mission is to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and, therefore, provide the multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government."

The President also reported that "All armed elements in the area have given us assurances that they will refrain from hostilities and will not interfere with the activities of the multinational force."

In recent weeks that mission has been expanded. In his report to the Congress on August 30 President Reagan said the multinational force, including Marines, "was designed to facilitate the restoration of the Lebanese Government's sovereignty and authority," thus omitting the previous limiting condition, that is, "in the Beirut area."

The President also said, "The continued presence of U.S. forces in Lebanon is essential to the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon."

A little different.

September 21 of this year, Secretary Shultz described the mission in broader and vaguer terms: "Peacekeeping mission 'to provide sense of security' an added measure of stability in the overall equation 'one crucial pillar in the structure of stability' an important deterrent, a symbol of the international backing behind the legitimate government of Lebanon, an important weighting of the scales."

He also described the important objectives: One, withdrawal of all external forces; two, restoration of control by the Lebanese Government; three, security for Israel's northern border.

And then we heard quoted by the Senator from Maryland at some length quotes by Secretary Shultz to the press on what I would characterize as even a further expansion of the mission of the Marines and the multinational force beyond what has already been stated.

Now, if that is not an incremental increase in the objective and the mission for the Marines, I do not know what is.

The fact of the matter is I think that we are now in a situation where we this week are about to vote on a resolution signing on the U.S. Marines in Lebanon. We should understand that the ante is able to be put up by the President, in my view is likely to be increased, and in my view is going to continue this incremental presence of the U.S. Government, the U.S. military, with or without the multinational force present in the region for objectives which are laudable but do not lend themselves to a military solution totally.

It seems to me that you in fact are going to find that, God forbid, there are 8 body bags in the next 4 months, or 80, or 800. Whatever in God's name is going to happen it is not likely that there is going to be no loss of American life or casualties in the region among those Marines in Lebanon.

So that is all I want to know as one Senator before I vote for anything, and the only way I know to get the answer is to invoke the War Powers Act and require nothing more than the War Powers Act, for the President within 48 hours to come up here and tell us low long we are in for, not in terms of time, that is, how many months, but how long do we stay before we can, as the Senator from Florida said earlier, declare we won and go home. What are we signing on for?

Since this is the first day of this debate, I will now yield the floor. Before I do, however, I would like to insert at this point the minority views of the Foreign Relations Committee so that as people go through this first day of comment and debate on this issue they will have up front the minority views set out.

I would like to take just a moment to read them, if I may.

Minority views signed on by all Democratic members of the Foreign Relations Committee.

MINORITY VIEWS OF ALL DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE MEMBERS

We strongly oppose the joint resolution on Lebanon sponsored by Senators Baker and Percy and approved in the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 9–7. In our judgment, its enactment would constitute (1) a dereliction of Congressional responsibility to uphold the principles and procedures of the War Powers Resolution of 1973; (2) a failure to require of the Administration a clearly articulated and persuasive statement of the mission which U.S. Marines have been deployed in Lebanon to implement; and (3) an 18-month "blank check" under which the Administration could pursue hitherto unspecified military objectives in Lebanon while asserting that it is operating with full Congressional sanction. These gravely serious flaws warrant elaboration:

(1) Dereliction of Congressional responsibility relating to the War Powers Resolution. The Baker-Percy language has been presented as a "bipartisan compromise" which, in the interest of avoiding a dispute over "legalisms," would allow Congress and the Executive to affirm principles which are in conflict. This would present, it is argued, a united front regarding U.S. policy in Lebanon.

We do not believe that the issues surrounding proper implementation of the War Power Resolution are mere "legalisms." At issue are constitutional questions of immense gravity. The War Powers Resolution is law, a law passed over President Nixon's veto by overwhelming majorities in both houses. The reservations expressed by the executive branch about the Resolution's constitutionality do not diminish or compromise its legal standing. In the absence of a Supreme Court ruling, only Congress can change or nullify that law. But by failing to demand adherence to obligations prescribed in the Resolution, Congress would abdicate its responsibility to uphold the law. In any event, Congress must not concede to the executive branch the contention that the War Powers Resolution is not binding in all of its particulars.

One approach, first proposed by Minority Leader Byrd and advocated in Committee by Senator Cranston, would have limited any joint resolution to a simple declaration that key provisions of section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution were triggered by hostilities in Lebanon on August 29, 1983, which resulted in the deaths of 2 Marines. Enactment of such a resolution would not—

I repeat "not." entail a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Lebanon. It would, however, achieve the essential result of affirming unmistakably the applicability of War Powers resolution procedures, including the requirement for Congressional authorization for the maintenance of U.S. forces in Lebanon beyond 60–90 days. Unfortunately, this proposal was defeated in Committee by a vote of 9–7.

The determined unwillingness of the Administration to recognize that the procedures stipulated by the War Powers Resolution are now in fact required became starkly evident during the Secretary of State's testimony before the Committee. Under questioning on September 21st about the relationship between the Baker-Percy resolution and future U.S. actions in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz was assiduously careful to reserve for the Commander-in-Chief a full range of options—regarding the scope of operations, the number of U.S. forces, and the duration of the involvement—even in disregard if necessary of the War Powers Resolution framework the Baker-Percy resolution would purportedly impose on the U.S. presence there. Congress cannot ignore what this means. The Administration is prepared to participate in a procedure which would give some appearance of creating a War Powers Resolution framework without really conceding that any such framework exists.

Not only is the War Powers Resolution the law; its applicability to the situation in Lebanon is manifest. Accordingly, we believe strongly that any resolution passed should allow no ambiguity as to whether the procedures set forth in the War Powers Resolution are required. By intentionally side-stepping the issue, the Baker-Percy resolution fails to meet that test.

(2) The Absence of a Clearly-Defined Policy. The constitutional ambiguity of the Baker-Percy resolution is paralleled by an alarming vagueness concerning the mission of the U.S. forces whose presence in Lebanon the resolution would purport to authorize. One year ago, on August 25, 1982, when U.S. Marines were first introduced into Lebanon, their mission was limited and precise: to provide a temporary buffer that would allow the evacuation from Lebanon of elements of the Palestine Liberation Organization within a specified period of time. Shortly thereafter, when the Marines were reintroduced into Lebanon, they were deployed to perform, as part of a Multinational Force, the less precisely-worded mission set forth in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters between the U.S. and Lebanese Governments. That agreement did, however, make clear that the U.S. military role would be confined to "the Beirut area" and would preclude involvement in combat.

While citing the September 25th agreement, the Baker-Percy resolution is drafted so as to be susceptible to an extremely broad—almost infinitely elastic—interpretation of the mission associated with the presence of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The "purposes" cited in Section 2 include "the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon" and the restoration of "full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory." Thus, over the period of one year, the stated mission of U.S. forces in Lebanon has expanded from a limited role, the feasibility of which Congress could evaluate, to a role too nebulous for Congress to evaluate and too far-reaching for U.S. military forces alone possibly to accomplish. Consequently, the effect of the resolution is to provide Congressional acquiescence in a policy involving American soldiers in a commitment the scope of which has yet to be defined even by its proponents.

A major advantage of the Byrd-Cranston proposal to invoke section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution is that it would require the Administration to submit for Congressional evaluation a clear statement of military mission. This the Baker-Percy resolution would not do. It is not an example of any "Vietnam syndrome" to find in that resolution a disturbing similarity to the "Gulf of Tonkin" resolution of 1964 which, being comparably vague and invoking the necessity of protecting American forces, was used by a different Administration to assert that it possessed Congressional support for an Indochina policy which proved to be one of everwidening involvement.

(3) An 18-Month "Blank Check." Since we take as serious the Administration's patent unwillingness to be bound by the stipulations of the War Powers Resolution, the duration of the Baker-Percy "authorization" is technically a moot point. Practically, however, a shorter "authorization" would at least require that Congress face again the issues—constitutional and policy—which Congress faces now but which the Baker-Percy formulation would allow it negligently to defer. Accordingly, we supported—but failed in a 9-8 vote to achieve—the substitution of a six-month "authorization" period, after which these issues would again necessarily be joined if U.S. forces remain in Lebanon. We reject the argument that a time period shorter than 18 months will endanger the lives of American soldiers by inviting hostile action against them intended to sway U.S. public opinion against a continued U.S. presence. If the Administration had offered a clearly-defined mission in Lebanon for the U.S. armed forces and had also acknowledged its legal obligations under the War Powers Resolution, such a limited "authorization" might be unnecessary. But if the Baker-Percy formulation is to be adopted, it should certainly stipulate a duration short enough to require Congress to review soon the crucial questions surrounding the U.S. involvement in Lebanon. We believe in any case—meaning, no matter what duration is specified—that to pass this resolution would represent a grave abdication of congressional responsibility.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BIDEN. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Delaware for yielding.

This is the first and opening day of debate on this very grave and serious issue. I think it is reasonable to expect that, before the Senate finally votes on the matter, each Member will understand just how important the decision we are making here is.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him for 60 seconds?

Mr. SARBANES. Surely, Mr. President.

Mr. BIDEN. Earlier, when I was referring to Camp David, I made reference, in reference to a comment by the Senator from Illinois, that we did not have American troops there assuring that it would be upheld. The fact of the matter is that, as the Senator knows, as we all know, there are U.S. troops to police the Sinai withdrawal. They are part of the Camp David peace treaty. But there are three significant differences. In Sinai, the administration specifically requested legislation, the mission of troops was governed by the Israeli and Egyptian treaty and the Sinai situation was one where hostilities were clearly not expected to develop and did not develop.

Mr. SARBANES. I might add that was a mission that was very clearly defined. I was a member of the committee when the request was made and we were able to have put before us exactly what was expected of the Americans involved, the responsibilities that they would be carrying out, and the circumstances in which those responsibilities would be carried out.

Mr. President, that brings me the first point I want to make in considering this resolution. That goes to the fact that the nature and mission of our troop involvement in Lebanon is not only not clearly defined, but is in the constant process of being expanded—of being started in broader, more general terms. I am going to have some material included in the RECORD and I hope Members will have an opportunity to look at it. It shows the administration moving to an expanded, unclearly defined commitment

When the American marines were first put in in the late August as part of the multinational force, they went into Lebanon under a plan for the evacuation of the PLO from West Beirut. That commitment was very carefully defined. The President made a statement on the 20th of August in the course of which he said:

Our purpose will be to assist the Lebanese Armed Forces in carrying out their responsibility for insuring the departure of PLO leaders, offices, and combatants in Beirut from Lebanese territory under safe and orderly conditions. The presence of U.S. forces also will facilitate the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Lebanese Government over the Beirut area. In no case will our troops stay longer than 30 days.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the full statement of President Reagan on August 20, from which I have just quoted, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT, AUGUST 20, 1982

Thank you all and let me just say in advance I'll be taking no questions because Secretary Shultz, a little later in the day, will be having a full press conference, so you can take everything up with him.

Ambassador Habib [Philip C. Habib, President's special emissary to the Middle East] has informed me that a plan to resolve the west Beirut crisis has been agreed upon by all the parties involved. As part of this plan, the government of Lebanon has requested, and I have approved, the deployment of U.S. forces to Beirut as part of a multinational force (MNF). The negotiations to develop this plan have been extremely complex and have been conducted in the most arduous circumstances. At times it was difficult to imagine how agreement could be reached and yet it has been reached. The statesmanship and the courage of President Sarkis and his colleagues in the Lebanese Government deserve special recognition as does the magnificent work of Ambassador Habib, Phil never lost hope and, in the end, his spirit and determination carried the day. We all owe him a debt of gratitude.

The parties who made this plan possible have a special responsibility for insuring its successful completion, or implementation. I expect its terms to be carried out in good faith and in accordance with the agreed timetable. This will require meticulous adherence to the cease-fire. Violations by any party would imperil the plan and bring renewed bloodshed and tragedy to the people of Beirut, and under no circumstances must that be allowed to happen. As you know, my agreement to include U.S. forces in a multinational force was essential for our success. In the days ahead, they and forces from France and Italy will be playing an important but carefully limited noncombatant role. The parties to the plan have agreed to this role and have provided assurances on the safety of our forces.

Our purpose will be to assist the Lebanese Armed Forces in carrying out their responsibility for insuring the departure of PLO leaders, offices, and combatants in Beirut from Lebanese territory under safe and orderly conditions. The presence of U.S. forces also will facilitate the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Lebanese Government over the Beirut area. I no case will our troops stay longer than 30 days. The participation of France and Italy in this effort is further evidence of the sense of responsibility of these good friends of the United States.

Successful resolution of the west Beirut crisis by responsible implementation of the plan now agreed will set the stage for the urgent international action required to restore Lebanon's full sovereignty, unity, and territorial integrity; obtain the rapid withdrawal of all foreign forces from that country; and help insure the security of northern Israel. We must also move quickly in the context of Camp David to resolve the Palestinian issue in all its aspects, as well as the other unresolved problems in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Only when all these steps are accomplished can true and lasting peace and security be achieved in the Middle East.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, that introduction of troops was pursuant to a departure plan which had been very carefully worked out. That plan set out the departure in great detail and provided among other things for the schedule of departures, the mandate of the multinational force, the duration of the multinational force—let me just quote that paragraph:

DURATION OF MNF

It will be mutually agreed between the Lebanese Government and the governments contributing forces to the MNF that the forces of the MNF will depart Lebanon not later than 30 days after arrival, or sooner at the request of the Government of Lebanon, or at the direction of the individual government concerned, or in accordance with the termination of the mandate of the MNF provided for above.

The departure plan goes on to set out the role of the International Committee of the Red Cross, provides for liaison and coordination, provides for matters governing the transit through Lebanon of PLO elements, and so forth and so on.

I ask unanimous consent that the departure plan and the factsheets on the departure be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the departure plan and fact sheets were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTURE PLAN

PLAN FOR THE DEPARTURE FROM LEBANON OF THE PLO LEADERSHIP, OFFICES, AND COMBATANTS IN BEIRUT

1. Basic Concept. All the PLO leadership, offices, and combatants in Beirut will leave Lebanon peacefully for prearranged destinations in other countries, in accord with the departure schedules and arrangements set out in this plan. The basic concept in this plan is consistent with the objective of the Government of Lebanon that all foreign military forces withdraw from Lebanon.

2. Cease-fire. A cease-fire in place will be scrupulously observed by all in Lebanon.

3. U.N. Observers. The U.N. Observer Group stationed in the Beirut area will continue its functioning in that area.

4. Safeguards. Military forces present in Lebanon—whether Lebanese, Israeli, Syrian, Palestinian, or any other—will in no way interfere with the safe, secure, and timely departure of the PLO leadership, offices, and combatants. Law-abiding Palestinian noncombatants left behind in Beirut, including the families of those who have departed, will be subject to Lebanese laws and regulations. The Governments of Lebanon and the United States will provide appropriate guarantees of safety in the following ways.

The Lebanese Government will provide its guarantees on the basis of having secured assurances from armed groups with which it has been in touch.

The United States will provide its guarantees on the basis of assurances received from the Government of Israel and from the leadership of certain Lebanese groups with which it has been in touch.

5. "Departure Day" is defined as the day on which advance elements of the multinational force (MNF) deploy in the Beirut area, in accordance with arrangements worked out in advance among all concerned, and on which the initial group or groups of PLO personnel commence departure from Beirut in accord with the planned schedule.

6. The Multinational Force. A temporary multinational force, composed of units from France, Italy, and the United States, will have been formed—at the request of the Lebanese Government—to assist the Lebanese Armed Forces in carrying out their responsibilities in this operation. The Lebanese Armed Forces will assure the departure from Lebanon of the PLO leadership, offices, and combatants, from whatever organization in Beirut, in a manner which will:

(A) Assure the safety of such departing PLO personnel;

(B) Assure the safety of other persons in the Beirut area; and

(C) Further the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Government of Lebanon over the Beirut area.

7. Schedule of Departures and Other Arrangements. The attached schedule of departures is subject to revision as may be necessary because of logistical requirements and because of any necessary shift in the setting of Departure Day. Details concerning the schedule will be forwarded to the Israeli Defense Forces through the Liaison and Coordination Committee. Places of assembly for the departing personnel will be identified by agreement between the Government of Lebanon and the PLO. The PLO will be in touch with governments receiving personnel to coordinate arrival and other arrangements there. If assistance is required the PLO should notify the Government of Lebanon.

8. MNF Mandate. In the event that the Departure from Lebanon of the PLO personnel referred to above does not take place in accord with the agreed and predetermined schedule, the mandate of the MNF will terminate immediately and all MNF personnel will leave Lebanon forthwith.

9. Duration of MNF. It will be mutually agreed between the Lebanese Government and the governments contributing forces to the MNF that the forces of the MNF will depart Lebanon not later than 30 days after arrival, or sooner at the request of the Government of Lebanon or at the direction of the individual government concerned, or in accord with the termination of the mandate of the MNF provided for above.

10. The PLO leadership will be responsible for the organization and management of the assembly and the final departure of PLO personnel, from beginning to end, at which time the leaders also will all be gone. Departure arrangements will be coordinated so that departures from Beirut take place at a steady pace, day by day.

11. Lebanese Armed Forces Contribution. The Lebanese Army will contribute between seven and eight army battalions to the operation, consisting of between 2,500–3,500 men. In addition, the internal security force will contribute men and assistance as needed.

12. ICRC. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) will be able to assist the Government of Lebanon and Lebanese Armed Forces in various ways, including in the organization and management of the evacuation of wounded and ill Palestinian and Syrian personnel to appropriate destinations, and in assisting in the chartering and movement of commercial vessels for use in departure by sea to other countries. The Liaison and Coordination Committee will insure that there will be proper coordination with any ICRC activities in this respect.

13. Departure by Air. While present plans call for departure by sea and land, departures by air are not foreclosed.

14. Liaison and Coordination:

The Lebanese Armed Forces will be the primary point of contact for liaison with the PLO as well as with other armed groups and will provide necessary information.

The Lebanese Armed Forces and MNF will have formed prior to Departure Day a Liaison and Coordination Committee, composed of representatives of the MNF participating governments and the Lebanese Armed Forces. The committee will carry out close and effective liaison with, and provide continuous and detailed information to, the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF). One behalf of the committee, the Lebanese Armed Forces will continue to carry out close and effective liaison with the PLO and other armed groups in the Beirut area. For convenience, the Liaison and Coordination Committee will have two essential components:

(A) Supervisory liaison; and

(B) Military and technical liaison and coordination.

The Liaison and Coordination Committee will act collectively; however, it may designate one or more of its members for primary liaison contact who would of course act on behalf of all.

Liaison arrangements and consultations will be conducted in such a way as to minimize misunderstandings and to forestall difficulties. Appropriate means of communications between the committee and other groups will be developed for this purpose.

The Liaison and Coordination Committee will continually monitor and keep all concerned currently informed regarding the implementation of the plan, including any revisions to the departure schedule as may be necessary because of logistical requirements.

15. Duration of Departure. The departure period shall be as short as possible and, in any event, no longer than 2 weeks.

16. Transit Through Lebanon. As part of any departure arrangement, all movements of convoys carrying PLO personnel must be conducted in daylight hours. When moving overland from Beirut to Syria, the convoys should cross the border into Syria with no stops en route. In those instances when convoys of departing PLO personnel pass through positions of the Israeli Defense Forces, whether in the Beirut area or elsewhere in Lebanon, the Israeli Defense Forces will clear the route for the temporary period in which the convoy is running. Similar steps will be taken by other armed groups located in the area of the route the convoy will take.

17. Arms Carried by PLO Personnel. On their departure, PLO personnel will be allowed to carry with them one individual side weapon (pistol, rifle, or submachine gun) and ammunition.

18. Heavy and Spare Weaponry and Munitions. The PLO will turn over to the Lebanese Armed Forces as gifts all remaining weaponry in their possession, including heavy, crew-served, and spare weaponry and equipment, along with all munitions left behind in the Beirut area. The Lebanese Armed Forces may seek the assistance of elements of the MNF in securing and disposing of the military equipment. The PLO will assist the Lebanese Armed Forces by providing, prior to their departure, full and detailed information as to the location of this military equipment.

19. Mines and Booby Traps. The PLO and the Arab Deterrent Force (ADF) will provide to the Lebanese Armed Forces and the MNF (through the Lebanese Armed Forces) full and detailed information on the location of mines and booby traps.

20. Movement of PLO Leadership. Arrangements will be made so that departing PLO personnel will be accompanied by a proportionate share of the military and political leadership throughout all stages of the departure operation.

21. Turnover of Prisoners and Remains. The PLO will, through the ICRC, turn over to the Israeli Defense Forces, all Israeli nationals whom they have taken in custody, and the remains, or full and detailed information about the location of the remains, of all Israeli soldiers who have fallen. The PLO will also turn over to the Lebanese Armed Forces all other prisoners whom they have taken in custody and the remains, or full and detailed information about the location of the remains, of all other soldiers who have fallen. All arrangements for such turnovers shall be worked out with the ICRC as required prior to Departure Day.

22. Syrian Military Forces. It is noted that arrangements have been made between the Governments of Lebanon and Syria for the deployment of all military personnel of the Arab Deterrent Force from Beirut during the departure period. These forces will be allowed to take their equipment with them, except for that—under mutual agreement between the two governments—which is turned over to the Lebanese Armed Forces. All elements of the Palestinian Liberation Army, whether or not they now or in the past have been attached to the Arab Deterent Force, will withdraw from Lebanon.

FACT SHEETS ON THE DEPARTURE

PLAN FOR THE DEPARTURE OF THE PLO

A plan for the departure from Lebanon of the PLO leaders, offices, and combatants in Beirut has been accepted by the Governments of Lebanon, the troop-contributing countries, and Israel and by the PLO. That plan includes a schedule of departures which is also attached to the bilateral notes exchanged between the Government of Lebanon and the troop-contributing countries.

The PLO will go to various countries in the region including Jordan, Iraq, Tunisia, North Yemen, South Yemen, Syria, Sudan, and Algeria.

Departing PLO personnel will be accompanied by a proportionate share of the military and political leadership throughout all stages of the departure arrangements.

The PLO will turn over the Lebanese Armed Forces their heavy and crew-served weapons, spare weaponry and equipment along with all munitions left behind in the Beirut area. They and the Arab Deterrent Force will also provide detailed information on the location of mines and booby traps to the Lebanese Armed Forces. On departure, PLO personnel may carry with them an individual side weapon and ammunition.

The Arab Deterrent Force (i.e., the Syrians) and those forces attached to the Arab Deterrent Force will also redeploy from Beirut during the period of the PLO departure. The Syrian military forces will take their equipment with them except for that which, by mutual agreement, is turned over to the Lebanese Armed Forces.

MNF COMPOSITION, AREA OF OPERATIONS, AND MISSION

Force Composition. The multinational force, which will be deployed to the Beirut area at the request of the Government of Lebanon will be comprised of approximately 400 Italian, 800 French, and 800 U.S. military personnel. The U.S. portion of the MNF will be comprised of Marines of the 32d Marine Amphibious Unit presently serving with elements of the Sixth Fleet on duty in the eastern Mediterranean.

Area of Operations. The MNF will operate in and around the Beirut area. It will take up positions and operate from locations determined by mutual agreement between the various national contingents and the Lebanese Armed Forces through the mechanism of a Liaison and Coordination Committee.

Mission. The multinational force will assist the Lebanese Armed Forces in carrying out its responsibilities for insuring the safe and orderly departure from Lebanon of the PLO leaders, offices, and combatants in a manner which will insure the safety of other persons in the area, and which will further the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Government of Lebanon over the Beirut area.

Duration of the MNF Mandate. It has been mutually agreed between the Government of Lebanon and those governments contributing forces to the MNF that these forces will depart Lebanon not later than 30 days after arrival, or sooner at the request of the Government of Lebanon or at the direction of the individual government concerned. There is also provision for the immediate termination of the mandate of the MNF and for its withdrawal from Beirut in the event that the departure from Lebanon of PLO personnel does not take place in accord with the predetermined schedule.

ROLE AND MISSION OF U.S. FORCES IN BEIRUT

U.S. forces will be deployed to Beirut as part of the multinational force based on an agreement between the U.S. Government and the Government of Lebanon.

The U.S. contingent of the multinational force will provide appropriate assistance to the Lebanese Armed Forces as they carry out their responsibilities concerning the withdrawal of PLO personnel in Beirut from Lebanese territory under safe and orderly conditions. The presence of U.S. forces also will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area.

U.S. forces will enter Beirut after the evacuation is well underway (probably 5 or 6 days thereafter) in concert with the Italian MNF contingent and the remainder of the French force. Approximately 800 Marines from Sixth Fleet units will be deployed. Command authority for the Marines will be exercised by the National Command Authority (NCA) through normal American military channels (EUCOM). These forces will not engage in combat but may exercise the right of self-defense. They will have freedom of movement and the right to undertake actions necessary to perform their mission or to support their personnel. U.S. personnel will be armed with usual infantry weapons.

Close coordination will be maintained with the Lebanese Armed Forces. There will be an exchange of liaison officers among the elements of the MNF and the Lebanese Armed Forces. A Liaison and Coordination Committee composed of representatives from the U.S., French, Italian, and Lebanese armed forces will assist this process. The Government of Lebanon and the Lebanese Armed Forces are taking measures necessary to insure the protection of U.S. forces including having secured assurances from armed elements that they will comply with the cease-fire and cessation of hostilities.

The U.S. contingent will be in Beirut for no more than 30 days.

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

The War Powers Resolution requires a report to Congress within 48 hours after the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces: (1) into foreign territory while equipped for combat; or (2) into hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

There is no intention or expectation that U.S. forces will become involved in hostilities in Beirut. They will be in Lebanon at the formal request of the Government of Lebanon; we will have assurances regarding the safety and security of the multinational force. Although we cannot rule out isolated acts of violence, all appropriate precautions will be taken to assure the safety of U.S. military personnel during their brief assignment to Lebanon.

These matters will, in any event, be kept under constant review, and the President will report to Congress consistent with the reporting requirements of the War Powers Resolution.

AGREEMENTS AND ASSURANCES

U.S. forces will participate in the multinational force in Beirut pursuant to an agreement between the U.S. Government and the Government of Lebanon. That agreement is in the form of an exchange of notes signed by Ambassador Dillon on behalf of the U.S. Government and Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs Boutros on behalf of the Lebanese Government.

The agreement describes the missions of the Lebanese Armed Forces, the MNF, and the U.S. forces participating in the MNF. It contains provisions concerning command authority for U.S. forces, coordination with the Lebanese Armed Forces and immunities of U.S. personnel. Annexed to the agreement is the schedule for the PLO departure from Beirut.

In accordance with the agreement, the Government of Lebanon has secured assurances from all armed elements not now under the authority of the Lebanese Government that they will comply with the cease-fire and cessation of hostilities. The Government of Israel has provided appropriate assurances.

ROLE OF THE ICRC IN MOVING THE PLO FROM WEST BEIRUT

The role envisaged for the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in moving the PLO from west Beirut is still being finalized on the basis of discussions in Geneva and Beirut.

In accordance with its charter, the ICRC will be expected to care for the sick and wounded combatants while in transit. Initially, the ICRC will arrange transport and provide medical care for the sick and wounded PLO personnel going to Greece.

FINANCING THE DEPARTURE OF THE PLO FROM WEST BEIRUT

The cost of chartering transport of the PLO combatants to receiving countries will be funded through international organizations. The United States is prepared to provide initial funding from State Department funds.

Estimates regarding the cost of evacuating PLO forces from West Beirut currently range from $2 to $4 million. This figure could be increased, however, as the number of people to be transported and their ultimate destinations are finalized.

(Mr. COCHRAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. I want to underscore again, Mr. President, that the departure plan is a very carefully perpared plan, thoroughly defining the circumstance under which our troops were first introduced into Lebanon. They went in on August 20. The mission was accomplished on September 11, and they came out ahead of schedule.

I ask that the schedule of departures related to this plan be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the schedule was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCHEDULE OF DEPARTURES

AUGUST 21, 1982—DEPARTURE DAY

The advance elements of the MNF (approximately 350 men) land at the Port of Beirut at about 0500 and deploy in the Beirut port area in preparation for the initial departures of PLO groups by sea.

Meanwhile the Lebanese Armed Forces deploy to previously agreed positions in the Beirut area, primarily in the so-called demarcation line area, to assist in the departure of PLO personnel. The Lebanese Armed Forces will take over positions occupied by the PLO.

The PLO will insure that National Movement Forces [collection of Lebanese militias] which had occupied these positions jointly with the PLO shall also withdraw.

As the day proceeds, the Lebanese Armed Forces will take up such other positions as necessary to assist in the departure of PLO personnel.

Meanwhile, the initial group of PLO personnel assemble in preparation for departure by sea later in the day (or on August 22). The vessel or vessels to be used for this purpose will arrive at pier on August 21.

The initial groups could include the wounded and ill, who would be transported in accordance with agreed arrangements—by sea or land, or both—to their destinations in other countries.

The initial group or groups of PLO personnel destined for Jordan and Iraq would move from their assembly point to the waiting commercial vessel or vessels for onward transport by sea.

AUGUST 22

All groups destined for Jordan or Iraq will have boarded ship and will have sailed from Beirut.

Duplicating the model followed on August 21, PLO groups destined for Tunisia assemble and move to the Port of Beirut for departure by sea.

AUGUST 23

All PLO personnel destined for Tunisia complete their assembly and embark on commercial vessel for Tunisia.

PLO personnel destined for South Yemen assemble and move to a vessel for departure then or on August 24.

AUGUST 24–25

Assembly and departure by sea of PLO personnel destined for North Yemen.

AUGUST 25

Provided that satisfactory logistical arrangements have been completed, the initial groups of PLO personnel destined for Syria assemble and move overland via the Beirut-Damascus highway to Syria

The advance French elements of the MNF already in the port area will have taken up such other agreed positions on the land route in the Beirut area as necessary to assist in the overland departure of the PLO personnel for Syria.

The Lebanese Armed Forces join with the French in occupying such positions

(If it should be agreed that these initial groups should go by sea to Syria rather than by land, this departure schedule also is subject to amendment to assure that logistical requirements are met.)

AUGUST 26–28 (APPROXIMATELY)

The remaining forces of the MNF (from the United States, France, and Italy) arrive in the Beirut area and deploy to agreed locations as determined through the Liaison and Coordinating Committee. This movement may be accompanied by the transfer of the advance French elements previously in the port area and elsewhere to other locations in the Beirut area.

AUGUST 26–27–28

PLO groups destined for Syria continue to move—by land or sea—to Syria.

AUGUST 22–SEPTEMBER 4

Turnover to the Lebanese Armed Forces of PLO weaponry, military equipment, and ammunition in a continuing and orderly fashion.

AUGUST 29–30–31

Redeployment out of Beirut of the Syrian elements of the ADF.

SEPTEMBER 1–4

Completion of the departure to Syria—by land or sea—of all PLO or Palestine Liberation Army personnel destined for Syria.

SEPTEMBER 2–3

Assembly and departure by sea of all PLO personnel destined for the Sudan.

Assembly and movement by sea of all PLO personnel destined for Algeria.

SEPTEMBER 4–21

The MNF assists the Lebanese Armed Forces in arrangements, as may be agreed between governments concerned, to insure good and lasting security throughout the area of operation

SEPTEMBER 21–26

Departure of MNF.

Mr. SARBANES. This schedule of departure sets out the projected timetable beginning with August 21, 1982, the departure day, and going right through to September 21 to 26, the dates of departure of the MNF. Actually, the multinational force departed ahead of those dates, the evacuation of the PLO having been accomplished.

I also ask that an exchange of notes dated August 18 and August 20, 1982 governing the U.S. contribution to the multinational force be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the exchange of notes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCHANGE OF NOTES

LEBANESE NOTE REQUESTING U.S. CONTRIBUTION TO MNF

BEIRUT,
August 18, 1982.

Ambassador ROBERT S. DILLON,
U.S. Embassy, Beirut

YOUR EXCELLENCY, I have the honor to refer to the many conversations between their Excellencies the President of the Republic of Lebanon, the Prime Minister and myself on the one hand, and with Ambassador Philip C. Habib, Special Emissary to the President of the United States of America, on the other hand, as well as to the resolution of the Council of Ministers passed today. I have the honor to refer to the schedule set up by the Government of Lebanon, after consultations with interested parties, in order to assure the withdrawal from Lebanese territory of the Palestinian leaders, offices and combatants related to any organization now in the Beirut area, in a manner which will:

(1) assure the safety of such departing persons;

(2) assure the safety of the persons in the area; and

(3) further the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Government of Lebanon over the Beirut area.

In this context, the Government of Lebanon is proposing to several nations that they contribute forces to serve as a temporary Multinational Force (MNF) in Beirut. The mandate of the MNF will be to provide appropriate assistance to the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) as they carry out the foregoing responsibilities, in accordance with the annexed schedule. The MNF may undertake other functions only by mutual agreement. It is understood that, in the event that the withdrawal of the Palestinian personnel referred to above does not take place in accord with the predetermined schedule, the mandate of the MNF will terminate immediately and all MNF personnel will leave Lebanon forthwith.

In the foregoing context, I have the honor to propose that the United States of America deploy a force of approximately 800 personnel to Beirut, subject to the following terms and conditions:

The American military force shall carry out appropriate activities consistent with the mandate of the MNF.

Command authority over the American force will be exercised exclusively by the United States Government through existing American military channels.

The American force will operate in close coordination with the LAF. To assure effective coordination with the LAF, the American force will assign liasion officers to the LAF and the Government of Lebanon will assign liasion officers to the American force. The LAF liaison officers to the American force will, inter alia, perform liaison with the civilian population and manifest the authority of the Lebanese Government in all appropriate situations.

In carrying out its mission, the American force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense.

The American force will depart Lebanon not later than thirty days after its arrival, or sooner at the request of the President of Lebanon or at the direction of the United States Government, or according to the termination of the mandate provided for above.

The Government of Lebanon and the LAF will take all measures necessary to ensure the protection of the American force's personnel, to include securing the assurances from all armed elements not now under the authority of the Lebanese Government that they will comply with the cease-fire and cessation of hostilities.

The American force will enjoy both the degree of freedom of movement and the right to undertake those activities deemed necessary for the performance of its mission or for the support of its personnel. Accordingly, it shall enjoy all facilities necessary for the accomplishment of these purposes. Personnel in the American force shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded the administrative and technical staff of the American Embassy in Beirut, and shall be exempt from immigration and customs requirements, and restrictions on entering or departing Lebanon. Personnel, property and equipment of the American force introduced into Lebanon shall be exempt from any form of tax, duty, charge or levy.

I have the further honor to propose, if the foregoing is acceptable to your Excellency's government, that your Excellency's reply to that effect, together with this note, shall constitute an agreement between our two governments, to enter into force on the date of your Excellency's reply.

Please accept, your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

FUAD BOUTROS,
Deputy Prime Minister
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

U.S. REPLY TO LEBANESE NOTE REQUESTING U.S. CONTRIBUTION TO MNF

AUGUST 20, 1982.

I have the honor to refer to your Excellency's note of 18 August 1982 requesting the deployment of an American force to Beirut. I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 800 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to provide appropriate assistance to the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) as they carry out their responsibilities concerning the withdrawal of Palestinian personnel in Beirut from Lebanese territory under safe and orderly conditions, in accordance with the schedule annexed to your Excellency's note. It is understood that the presence of such an American force will in this way facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, an objective which is fully shared by my government.

I have the further honor to inform you that my government accepts the terms and conditions concerning the presence of the American force in the Beirut area as set forth in your note, and that your Excellency's note and this reply accordingly constitute an agreement between our two governments.

ROBERT S. DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States of America.

Mr. SARBANES. That exchange of notes, I would point out, stated, among other things, that in carrying out its mission the American forces will not engage in combat. Furthermore it provided that "The American force will depart Lebanon not later than 30 days after its arrival, or sooner at the request of the President of Lebanon or at the direction of the U.S. Government, or according to the termination of the mandate provided for above."

Mr. President, the President sent a letter to the Secretary General of the United Nations on August 20 concerning this matter. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S LETTER TO THE U.N. SECRETARY GENERAL, AUGUST 20, 1982

Letter dated August 20, 1982, from the Charge d'Affairs a.i. of the U.S. Permanent Mission to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary General

I have the honour to transmit the following message from the President of the United States:

"DEAR MR. SECRETARY-GENERAL: As you know, the Government of the Republic of Lebanon has requested the deployment of a multinational force in Beirut to assist the Lebanese armed forces as they carry out the orderly and safe departure of Palestinian personnel now in the Beirut area in a manner which will further the restoration of the sovereignty and authority of the Government of Lebanon over the Beirut area. The Lebanese Government has asked for the participation of United States military personnel in this force, together with military personnel from France and Italy.

"I wish to inform you that the United States Government has agreed, in response to this request from the Lebanese Government, to deploy a force of about 800 personnel to Beirut for a period not exceeding 30 days. It is my firm intention and belief that these troops will not be involved in hostilities during the course of this operation.

"The deployment of this United States force is consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as set forth in Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter. It furthers the goals of Security Council resolutions 508 (1982) and 509 (1982) adopted in June at the beginning of the Lebanese conflict. The force will plan to work closely with the United Nations observer group stationed in the Beirut area.

"The agreement will support the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon. It is part of the continuing efforts of the United States Government to bring lasting peace to that troubled country, which has too long endured the trials of civil strife and armed conflict.

RONALD REAGAN."

I have the honour to request that the present letter be circulated as an official document of the General Assembly, under item 34 of the provisional agenda, and of the Security Council.

KENNETH L. ADELMAN,
Ambassador.

Mr. SARBANES. And then on August 24, 1982, the President sent a letter to the Congress. In the course of that letter, he says as follows—and I am now quoting excerpts from his letter and then I will ask unanimous consent that the full text be included in the RECORD:

I want to emphasize that there is no intention or expectation the U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities. They are in Lebanon at the formal request of the Government of Lebanon. Our agreement with the Government of Lebanon expressly rules out any combat responsibilities for the U.S. forces. All armed elements in the area have given assurances that they will take no action to interfere with the implementation of the departure plan or the activities of the multinational force. (The departure has been underway for some days now and thus far these assurances have been fulfilled.) Finally, the departure plan makes it clear that in the event of a breakdown in its implementation, the multinational force will be withdrawn. Although we cannot rule out isolated acts of violence, all appropriate precautions have thus been taken to assure the safety of U.S. military personnel during the brief assignment to Lebanon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of that letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S LETTER TO THE CONGRESS, AUG. 24, 1982

On August 18, 1982, the Government of Lebanon established a plan for the departure from Lebanon of the Palestine Liberation Organization leadership, offices, and combatants in Beirut. This plan has been accepted by the Government of Israel. The Palestine Liberation Organization has informed the Government of Lebanon that it also has accepted the plan. A key element of this plan is the need for a multinational force, including a United States component, to assist the Government of Lebanon in carrying out its responsibilities concerning the withdrawal of these personnel under safe and orderly conditions. This will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area.

In response to the formal request of the Government of Lebanon, and in view of the requirement for such a force in order to secure the acceptance by concerned parties of the departure plan, I have authorized the Armed Forces of the United States to participate on a limited and temporary basis. In accordance with my desire that the Congress be fully informed on this matter, and consistent with the War Powers Resolution, I am hereby providing a report on the deployment and mission of these members of the United States Armed Forces.

On August 21, in accordance with the departure plan, approximately 350 French military personnel—the advance elements of the multinational force—were deployed in Beirut together with elements of the Lebanese armed Forces, and the departure of Palestinian personnel began. To date, Palestinian personnel have departed Lebanon in accordance with the terms of the plan.

On August 25, approximately 800 Marines began to arrive in Beirut. These troops are equipped with weapons consistent with their non-combat mission, including usual infantry weapons.

Under our agreement with the Government of Lebanon, these U.S. military personnel will assist the Government of Lebanon in carrying out its reponsibilities concerning the withdrawal of Palestinian personnel under safe and orderly conditions. The presence of our forces will in this way facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority in the Beirut area. Our forces will operate in close coordination with the Lebanese Armed Forces, which will have 2,500-3,500 personnel assigned to this operation, as well as with a total of approximately 800 French and 400 Italian military personnel in the multinational force. Transportation of the personnel departing is being carried out by commercial air and sea transport, and by land. According to our agreement with the Government of Lebanon, the United States military personnel will be withdrawn from Lebanon within thirty days.

I want to emphasize that there is no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities. They are in Lebanon at the formal request of the Government of Lebanon. Our agreement with the Government of Lebanon expressly rules out any combat responsibilities for the U.S. forces. All armed elements in the area have given assurances that they will take no action to interfere with the implementation of the departure plan or the activities of the multinational force. (The departure has been underway for some days now, and thus far these assurances have been fulfilled.) Finally, the departure plan makes it clear that in the event of a breakdown in its implementation, the multinational force will be withdrawn. Although we cannot rule out isolated acts of violence, all appropriate precautions have thus been taken to assure the safety of U.S. military personnel during their brief assignment to Lebanon.

This deployment of the United States Armed Forces to Lebanon is being undertaken pursuant to the President's constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armed Forces.

This step will not, by itself, resolve the situation in Lebanon, let alone the problems which have plagued the region for more than thirty years. But I believe that it will improve the prospects for realizing our objectives in Lebanon:

A permanent cessation of hostilities;

Establishment of a strong, representative central government;

Withdrawal of all foreign forces;

Restoration of control by the Lebanese Government throughout the country; and Establishment of conditions under which Lebanon no longer can be used as a launching point for attacks against Israel. I also believe that progress on the Lebanon problem will contribute to an atmosphere in the region necessary for progress towards the establishment of a comprehensive peace in the region under Camp David, based firmly on U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, all of this documentation, which has now been included in the RECORD, makes it very clear that at the time of the initial commitment of American troops to the multinational force in Lebanon there was a very careful, detailed, spelled out role. The Congress was in a position to evaluate that role, to look at it and to reach some judgment about the circumstances into which our troops were being committed, the benefits that were going to flow from that commitment, and the risks that were involved. the subsequent reintroduction of our troops into Lebanon later in September was governed only by and exchange of notes between our Ambassador to Lebanon and the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Deputy Prime Minister of Lebanon. Mr. President, as a reading of the motion will indicate the reference is primarily to the role that the forces were going to play in the Beirut area.

I ask unanimous consent that that exchange of notes be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the notes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

9. AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND LEBANON ON UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN A MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN BEIRUT.

Effected by exchange of notes at Beirut September 25, 1982.

Entered into force September 25, 1982.

No. 100

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to Your Excellency's note of 25 September 1982 requesting the deployment of an American Force to the Beirut area. I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my Government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area. It is understood that the presence of such an American Force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, an objective which is fully shared by my Government, and thereby further efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred.

His Excellency
FOUAD BUTRUS,
Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Beirut.

I have the further honor to inform Your Excellency that my Government accepts the terms and conditions concerning the presence of the American Force in the Beirut area as set forth in your note, and that Your Excellency's note and this reply accordingly constitute an agreement between our two Governments.

BEIRUT, the 25th of September 1982.

His Excellency Mr. ROBERT DILLON,
Ambassador of the United States, Beirut.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to the urgent discussions between representatives of our two governments concerning the recent tragic events which have occurred in the Beirut area, and to consultations between my government and the Secretary General of the United Nations pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 521. On behalf of the Republic of Lebanon, I wish to inform Your Excellency's Government of the determination of the Government of Lebanon to restore its sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area and thereby to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring an end to violence that has recurred. To this end, Israeli forces will withdraw from the Beirut area.

In its consultations with the Secretary General, the Government of Lebanon has noted that the urgency of the situation requires immediate action, and the Government of Lebanon, therefore, is, in conformity with the objectives in U.N. Security Council Resolution 521, proposing to several nations that they contribute forces to serve as a temporary Multinational Force (MNF) in the Beirut area. The mandate of the MNF will be to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and thereby provide the Multinational presence requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) in the Beirut area. This presence will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, and thereby further efforts of my government to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred. The MNF may undertake other functions only by mutual agreement.

In the foregoing context, I have the honor to propose that the United States of America deploy a force of approximately 1200 personnel to Beirut, subject to the following terms and conditions:

The American military force shall carry out appropriate activities consistent with the mandate of the MNF.

Command authority over the American Force will be exercised exclusively by the United States Government through existing American military channels.

The LAF and MNF will form a liaison and coordination Committee, composed of representatives of the MNF participating governments and chaired by the representatives of my Government. The Liaison and Coordination Committee will have two essential components: (A) Supervisory liaison; and (B) Military and technical liaison and coordination.

The American Force will operate in close coordination with the LAF. To assure effective coordination with the LAF, the American Force will assign liaison officers to the LAF and the Government of Lebanon will assign liaison officers to the American Force. The LAF liaison officers to the American Force will, inter alia, perform liaison with the civilian population and with the U.N. observers and manifest the authority of the Lebanese Government in all appropriate situations. The American Force will provide security for LAF personnel operating with the U.S. contingent.

In carrying out its mission, the American Force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense.

It is understood that the presence of the American Force will be needed only for a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the current situation. The MNF contributors and the Government of Lebanon will consult fully concerning the duration of the MNF presence. Arrangements for the departure of the MNF will be the subject of special consultations between the Government of Lebanon and the MNF participating governments. The American Force will depart Lebanon upon any request of the President of Lebanon or upon the decision of the President of the United States.

The Government of Lebanon and the LAF will take all measures necessary to ensure the protection of the American Force's personnel, to include securing assurances from all armed elements not now under the authority of the Lebanese Government that they will refrain from hostilities and not interfere with any activities of the MNF.

The American Force will enjoy both the degree of freedom and movement and the right to undertake those activities deemed necessary for the performance of its mission for the support of its personnel. Accordingly, it shall enjoy the privileges and immunities accorded the administrative and technical staff of the American Embassy in Beirut, and shall be exempt from immigration and customs requirements, and restrictions on entering or departing Lebanon. Personnel, property and equipment of the American Force introduced into Lebanon shall be exempt from any form of tax, duty, charge or levey.

I have the further honor to propose, if the foregoing is acceptable to Your Excellency's Government, that Your Excellency's reply to that effect, together with this Note, shall constitute an agreement between our two governments.

Please accept, Your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration.

FOUAD BOUTROS,
Deputy-Prime Minister,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, what has happened is that the mission and purpose of our troops is being expanded, broadened; it is becoming more general and more vague, and therefore, it is becoming increasingly difficult to evaluate what the task is and how feasible it is that our troops there will be able to achieve it.

Furthermore, it is difficult to evaluate whether in fact the resources made available are adequate to the task. Are we in effect taking on a responsibility for which we have not committed the resources? Does that mean in the future we will diminish the responsibility or increase the resources?

The two notes that I referred to dated September 25, 1982, governing the reintroduction of American troops—I want to be very clear about this—the first commitment of troops in my judgment was done under very specific, detailed terms that allowed an evaluation to be made as to why they were being sent, what the purpose was, and the likelihood of accomplishment. The second reintroduction was much more vague. The note from our Ambassador says:

I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my Government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1,200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area. It is understood that the presence of such an American Force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area. * * *

Now, Mr. President, the resolution that is before us to provide an authorization goes well beyond the responsibilities set out in the exchange of notes.

As to Senate Joint Resolution 166, the matter that is now before the Senate, I am now quoting the title of this joint resolution:

Providing statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued U.S. participation in the Multinational Peacekeeping Force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

Note that well: "in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon."

Then, in its findings and purposes, section 2.(a), the resolution states:

The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East.

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

Mr. President, we see a clear progression. We see the following movement; the first introduction of the forces to cover the evacuation of the PLO was very carefully and specifically defined; the reintroduction of the forces governed by two notes which were vague about its role, although referenced to the Beirut area; and now a joint resolution before us which, while referring in section 3 to the earlier exchange of notes, contains language in its findings and purposes and its title which clearly reflects a broader role and assignment for our troops. Nor is that the end of the progression that is taking place.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware and I had a discussion earlier about the comments of the Secretary of State over the weekend, in an interview, in which he said that the mission of the U.S. Marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian, and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

The article went on to say:

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational force's being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those area, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 25, 1983]

SHULTZ TIES WITHDRAWAL TO LEBANON'S STABILITY

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior administration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows if the Syrians will every agree to pull out."

Mr. Shultz's comments, which came in an interview over the Cable News Network, were likely to cause further concern in Congress because, as he did when he testified last Wednesday before two congressional committees, the secretary refused to guarantee that the marines now in Lebanon would be pulled out in 18 months or that the size of the contingent or the scope of its mission would be expanded.

A resolution pending before Congress that President Reagan has agreed to sign is meant by its congressional sponsors to put definite limits on the role of the marines under the authority of the 1973 War Powers Act.

When asked if he would guarantee that the size of the force would not be enlarged, Mr. Shultz said yesterday that although there was no plan for an increase, he would not provide a "guarantee, which is a flat, unequivocal, never-say-never type of thing."

He said in defending his refusal to give a pledge of no change that "you can't foresee what the situation may be."

"And I don't want to be in the position of acting as though I know exactly what the situation will be," he said.

At one point in the interview, the secretary refused to provide details on the conditions for pulling out the approximately 5,500 American, British, French, and Italian members of the multinational force. But under questioning, he added:

"We have to judge the situation, and we want to have the marines continue their mission, and the other multinational force elements continue their mission, in supporting the emergence of stability in Lebanon. If we can find a situation in Lebanon that has stability in it, in terms of the structure of the government and removal of foreign forces, that's the objective."

When asked if that meant it would not be possible to achieve "stability" without the removal of the foreign forces, he agreed, saying: "I think that if you have a country with, say, 75 percent or so occupied by foreign forces, it's hard to see how the government of that country has control of it, and has stability."

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational force's being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or

PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese.

U.S. officials said yesterday they were not certain how many foreign troops are in Lebanon. But one official estimated there are about 15,000 Israelis in southern Lebanon, about 40,000 Syrians in eastern and northern Lebanon and 11,000 to 15,000 Palestinian forces, some of them attached to the Syrian army and others on their own. There also are small numbers of Iranians and Libyans in support of the anti-government forces in Lebanon.

Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R, Md.), when told of Mr. Shultz's comments yesterday, said that he felt the administration was being "ungenerous" and "unresponsive," given the desire of Congress to be cooperative. But he said that although the administration does not want "to waive any of its rights," he believed that once the resolution limiting the time, scope and size of the U.S. involvement in Lebanon was passed and signed, the administration probably would be "willing to live with it."

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think it is becoming more and more apparent that we do not have a clear definition of what the role of our men in Lebanon is to be; that, in effect, what is happening is that we are being drawn into an open-ended commitment.

The joint resolution, in fact, even states in section 6 that the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon will not necessarily mean that our troops will come out, because the President could determine and certify that their continued participation in the multinational force is required.

So, even if the foreign forces are taken out—which is in itself a tremendous expansion of our responsibility and role—but even if that is achieved, the administration has made it clear that it may continue to keep the troops there. That is the point the Secretary made in his interview over the weekend.

Mr. President, before Senators focus too much on the 18-month versus the 6-month question—and that has been portrayed by some as critical in this matter—it is more important to focus on the role and scope of our troops. By way of comparision, we have people in the Sinai carrying out a role that was carefully defined, whose risks could be evaluated, whose benefits could be evaluated, and that role has continued over a lengthy period of time.

I agree with the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), who said yesterday on "Meet the Press":

I do not believe we ought to be debating a time limit. I think we ought to be debating our role in Lebanon.

Beyond that—and this is the final point I want to get on the record before today's debate finishes—beyond that is the indication by the administration that, whatever the terms of this authorizing resolution are, they do not feel that their authority to act is contained within the terms of the resolution and that they will continue to assert a constitutional authority outside the resolution: in effect, to increase the role, the numbers, the time period—all on the basis of an assertion of the President's constitutional authority.

As we know, the President has indicated that he intends to make a reservation at the time he signs this resolution, and it is very clear that the reservation which he intends to make is that he is reserving all of his consititional authorities.

I had an extended question period with the Secretary on this particular issue in the committee, and in a moment I am going to ask that a substantial portion of that discussion be printed in the RECORD. I just want to quote from it. This is my question to the Secretary:

• • • you would not agree to the authorization being for 18 months and then it being clear that to stay there, the President would have to come back to the Congress; is that correct?

Secretary Shultz said: "That is correct."

The administration reads this resolution, even with an 18-month period, as not constituting a limitation upon them.

Later, I asked Secretary Shultz:

Now, there is a difference between consultation and obtaining an authorization from the Congress. Is it the administration's position that what they need to do is consult with the Congress, or that they need to obtain an authorization from the Congress, that they could not expand the number or role without a specific congressional authorization?

The Secretary frequently stated that the administration would consult with Congress, but as we all know, consultation and authorization are two very different things and that difference goes to the very meaning of the War Power Act.

The Secretary said, in response to that question:

I think the President or pershaps any of you if you were President, thinking about your role, your constitutional role as Commander in Chief, would be very reluctant to tie your hands and say that you could only order U.S. forces to do something or often after the Congress had authorized it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that the Democratic leader's time has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, could I get 10 minutes from the other side to finish this opening statement?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I understand that my distinguished colleague from Maryland, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, would like 10 minutes yielded time of our time.

Mr. SARBANES. I understand that we had a 3-hour debate period and we have exhausted our time.

Mr. PERCY. I am happy to yield 10 minutes if that would be sufficient.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. A further question directed to the Secretary was as follows:

• • • as I pointed out, the word "consultation" and the word "authorization" are two very different things. As I understand the responses to the questions, the administration, at the same time that it seeking to obtain this authorization, is not any way relinquishing its assertion of authority to increase numbers, scope and time period.

Secretary Shultz reponded:

I can only go back to the generality of it and say that the President has no intention of turning over the Congress his constitutional responsibilities as Commander in Chief. Now that does not mean that you ignore the Congress wishing and, of course, the Congress has to provide funds and so on. It is only sensible to consult and try to move forward in tandem on these matters. But in the end, as a matter of principle, the President must maintain his constitutional responsibility as Commander in Chief.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the longer exchange from which these questions and answers were taken be printed in the RECORD at this point. I note that the exchange appears at pages 26-29 of the printed hearing of September 21, 1983, before the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is on the Secretary's desk.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator SARBANES. Mr. Secretary, I want to try to develop with you the breadth and range of the authorization that the administration is seeking from the Congress. I think I can do that by making reference to provisions of the resolution and obtaining your understanding of them.

Is it the administration's view that at the end of the 18-month period that the President, pursuant to the other constitutional powers which the President asserts, could maintain troops there without a congressional authorization?

Secretary SHULTZ. If we get to the end of the 18-month period, of course, we do not know what the fact situation will be. The resolution sets out conditions for termination, including an 18-month period, and provides for, and unless the Congress votes I think it is fair to say, as Chairman Zablocki stated this morning in the House, that essentially you would be constitutionally where we are right now.

Senator SARBANES. in other words, the administration does assert the constitutional authority to maintain the troops under the other provisions of the constitution, is that correct?

Secretary SHULTZ. The President has stated that he will sign this resolution, and among the reasons for doing so is it seems to be a way of preserving the constitutional principles that each side to this negotiation feels are of great importance, without prejudging them one way or another.

Senator SARBANES. I understand that, and I take it the reservation which the president is going to express upon the signing—I have not seen what that reservation is going to be; I have only been told that he is going to express reservations—I take it will run to an assertion that he does have constitutional authority acting as Commander in Chief to commit these troops and to keep them there; is that correct? Is that the reservation that will be made?

Secretary SHULTZ. I certainly would expect that the heart of the reservation runs to his constitutional duties as Commander in Chief.

Senator SARBANES. Then I take it, consistent with that, it is the position of the Administration that at the end of the 18-month period the President could keep the troops there pursuant to that constitutional authority?

Secretary SHULTZ. I think the constitutional issue is a general one and would apply across the board. This resolution is an effort to put that issue to the side for the time being and go on to the substance of this matter.

Senator SARBANES. I take it you would be opposed, in section 6 of the resolution, to striking the language "for purposes of the War Powers Resolution" as far as the authorization for 18 months is concerned? In other words, you would not agree to the authorization being for 18 months and then it being clear that to stay there the President would have to come back to the Congress, is that correct?

Secretary SHULTZ. That is correct.

Senator SARBANES. Now, the resolution also provides that:

"Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits or supersedes any of the provisions of the War Powers Resolution or the requirements of Section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act relating to Congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number of or role of the United States Armed Forces in Lebanon."

Does that mean that the role or number, substantial expansion of the number or role of the U.S. Armed Forces cannot take place without a congressional authorization? Or would the Executive again assert that it could do that under the Commander in Chief powers and that therefore that question also remains open, just as the previous one does?

Secretary SHULTZ. The President has signed that statute and it is our full intention, if there is any change in the mission or a significant change in the numbers of marines deployed, to come and consult with the Congress about that as required by the law.

Senator SARBANES. As I read the law—and I am trying to be clear on this, because you did mention it earlier. You said you would come back to the Congress and consult about it.

Now, there is a difference between consultation and obtaining an authorization from the Congress. Is it the administration's position that what they need to do is consult with the Congress, or that they need to obtain an authorization from the Congress, that they could not expand the number or role without a specific congressional authorization?

Secretary SHULTZ. I think the President, or perhaps any of you if you were president, thinking about your rule, your constitutional role as Commander in Chief, would be very reluctant to tie your hands and say that you could only order U.S. forces to do something or other after the Congress had authorized it.

Senator SARBANES. So it is your position, then, that you could substantially expand them without a congressional authorization?

Secretary SHULTZ. The constitutional reservation goes to the President's role as Commander in Chief, and therefore to his capacity to be in charge of the deployment of the Armed Forces of the United States. I have no doubt that he will continue to assert that role.

The effort that is being made here in putting together this resolution and in working on the Lebanon situation generally is to try to work in a collaborative and consultative fashion with the Congress, and certainly that is our intent, at the same time not to prejudice or foreclose these fundamental constitutional principles.

Senator SARBANES. I understand that. But what this questioning is bringing out is that, while the administration is here seeking an authorization from the Congress, it is reserving its authority and right to increase the numbers, increase the scope, and increase the time period, in each instance without a congressional authorization.

Secretary SHULTZ. It is the intent of the administration to consult closely with the Congress on such matters.

Senator SARBANES. I understand that. But as I pointed out, the word "consultation" and the word "authorization" are two very different things. As I understand the responses to the questions, the administration, at the same time that it is seeking to obtain this authorization, is not in any way relinquishing its assertion of authority to increase numbers, scope and time period.

Secretary SHULTZ. I can only go back to the generality of it and say that the President has no intention of turning over to the Congress his constitutional responsibilities as Commander in Chief. Now, that does not mean that you ignore the Congress wishes, and of course the Congress has to provide funds and so on. It is only sensible to consult and try to move forward in tandem on these matters.

But in the end, as a matter of principle the President must maintain his constitutional responsibility as Commander in Chief.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I urge Members to read the minority views to the committee report before reaching a judgment on this important issue. The above questioning is one of the reasons why the minority views make the point that the war powers resolution is not being applied in this instance, despite the assertion that a so-called compromise has been reached.

As the report states, "The determined unwillingness of the administration to recognize that the procedures stipulated by the war powers resolution are now in fact required became starkly evident during the Secretary of State's testimony before the committee. Under questioning on September 21 about the relationship between the Baker-Percy resolution and future U.S. actions in Lebanon, Secretary Shultz was assiduously careful to reserve for the Commander in Chief a full range of options—regarding the scope of operations, the number of U.S. Forces and the duration of the involvement—even in disregard if necessary of the war powers resolution framework the Baker-Percy resolution would purportedly impose on the U.S. presence there." Congress cannot ignore what this means. The administration is prepared to participate in a procedure which would give some appearance of creating a war powres resolution framework without really conceding that any such framework exists.

So aside from the terms contained in Senate Joint Resolution 166, which, of course, raise serious questions in and of themselves, particularly with respect to the role and mission of our troops, we also have to face the situation that the administration is asserting an authority to act beyond or outside of the resolution.

And it is for that reason that the minority in its views has made it very clear that in our judgment the war powers resolution is not being applied. We do not believe that the issues surrounding proper implementation of the war powers resolution are mere "legalisms." At issue are constitutional questions of immense gravity, involving how this Nation is going to make the decision to involve American Forces in hostilities.

It does not take much anticipation of what might develop to recognize that Congress is being drawn into providing an open-ended authorization. The terms of the authorization itself, both as to time and nature and scope, are in effect open ended and beyond that the administration asserts that the terms are not really limitations, but that they have the authority to go beyond the terms.

It is no wonder that the Sunday New York Times in commenting on the question-and-answer session with Secretary Shultz stated:

> It left one senior House Democrat leader worrying privately that instead of being a cautioning or restraining hand, this resolution becomes a legitimizing instrument for the President, freeing him from political pressures to move cautiously.

Mr. President, clearly this is a matter to which we need to give the most serious and careful attention. We have the issue of the congressional role as it concerns the warmaking power. We have been through that before. The war powers resolution was passed simply to guard against situations of the very sort that we are being confronted with here.

The administration does not accede that it is bound by the terms of this resolution. They continue to assert an authority outside of it.

If they conceded they were bound by the terms of the resolution, then one would have to look at its terms, and there would be serious questions about the lack of a clearly defined policy; about the 18-month blank check.

I agree with the conclusion of the minority report that to pass this resolution before us would represent a grave abdication of congressional responsibility. It would represent a dereliction of congressional responsibilities relating to the war powers resolution. It would represent providing an authorization in the absence of a clearly defined policy and, in fact, in the presence of a policy being more broadly and vaguely defined with each passing day.

We need a clearly defined policy because we need to be able to evaluate whether there is a reasonable prospect of achieving that policy.

The Secretary suggests now that we will be in there until the foreign troops leave. Are we to drive the foreign troops out? And, once they leave, are we to stay in order to make sure that they do not come back? What is our role to be? It has not been fully, clearly defined and, therefore, we are facing once again the prospect of providing an open ended commitment.

I think that would be a serious mistake. I join with the minority report—a very close minority, 9 to 7 in the committee—in urging that this resolution not be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum to be charged against the time remaining on this debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, with regard to the war powers resolution offered by Senators BAKER and myself, those who oppose this resolution may be under the mistaken impression that this resolution provides unlimited authority for the President in Lebanon. That is clearly not the intention of this resolution. The resolution puts limitations on the scope of U.S. Forces in Lebanon in at least two ways.

First, it is written in such a way that it does not fulfill the requirements of section 4 of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act. That section requires the President to obtain statutory authorization for "any substantial expansion in the number or role" of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon. Thus, under the provisions of that act, if the President intends to substantially expand either the "number or role" of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon, additional authorization would still be required.

Second, the resolution provides the President with authority to implement the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters with the Lebanese Government. According to our committee report:

> Three principal limitations on the U.S. role are contained in that agreement: the number of U.S. troops will be approximately 1,200; they will operate in the Beirut area in support of the Lebanese Government; and they are not expected to perform a combat mission.

Finally, there has been discussion of language in the resolution which authorizes U.S. Forces to take measures to protect themselves. The committee does not interpret this as an open ended authorization. The committee's report language also interprets this authority in a limited way. The committee report states:

> The committee does not believe that such actions—protective measures—necessarily change the role of the U.S. Forces, so long as the task of the U.S. Forces is not to duplicate or supplant the functions of the Lebanese Armed Forces or to redeploy from the Beirut area, or in other respects to exceed the limited mandate of the multinational force or the limitations of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983.

Therefore, I believe we are providing the President the authority he needs to uphold the commitments made by all members of the multinational force. We are not providing him with a new Gulf of Tonkin resolution.

Let me answer just a few questions that have been put on the floor of the Senate by other Senators. Let me also note that except for Senator Sarbanes, there is not another single Senator on the floor of the Senate right now on this important resolution involving the War Powers Act. Maybe the steam has been taken out, and I trust that it has been taken out, by the cease-fire that has been achieved.

Maybe we have already proven the point, that the passage of that resolution by a vote of 30 to 6 by the House Foreign Affairs Committee, its support by the Speaker of the House and its support by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee although by a much tighter and, regrettably, partisan vote of 9 to 7, is an indication that the Senate and the House support the resolution.

We again need to speak with one voice. The proof that this action is a wise action is evidenced by the fact that, as of last night, Syria, Lebanon, the Palestinians, and Saudi Arabia came to agreement on a cease-fire that, as of this moment is still holding.

No one can guarantee that it will hold permanently.

Our hopes are high. Nevertheless, we have to be somewhat skeptical because dozens of cease-fires have been made and broken in Lebanon during the last 8 years.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the fact that only a few Senators have been present reflects the fact that this was the opening debate, and therefore would probably be occupied by the members of the Foreign Relations Committee.

I hope Senators will read very carefully not only the statements but the materials that have been included in the RECORD today. Also that they will review the committee report and minority views and the transcripts of the hearing and the markup that were held on Wednesday and Friday of last week.

I think it is very important that Senators do that. The Senator from Illinois just rejected the view asserted by some of the opponents of the resolution that the terms contained therein were not in fact limitations. I take that view in light of the testimony of the Secretary of State before our committee and his responses to questions.

I do not ask Senators to take either my assertion or the assertion of the Senator from Illinois on that issue. I ask them to read the RECORD, to read the questions and answers and reach their own judgment as to what the import of the Secretary's responses are. The same applies with respect to the article placed in the RECORD reporting on an interview of the Secretary's over the weekend in which he indicates a much broader role for the American Marines in Lebanon, a role running throughout that country and even going so far, as one senior spokesman in the administration apparently stated, as insuring that once the Syrians and PLO left we would insure that they would not come back.

So I simply say to the Senator that I think we have begun the debate today and hopefully much of what is being put in the RECORD will be carefully reviewed by Members. I agree completely that it is a very serious judgment we have before us.

Mr. PERCY. I thank my distinguished colleague. First of all, I would like to repeat what I said in the Foreign Relations Committee. I think the debate held in that committee on the war powers action was among the best debates I have ever heard in any committee at any time in 16½ years, and it dealt with one of the most important issues we have had.

I particularly commend the Senator from Maryland, who really gave incisive thought and reasoned arguments. I did not agree with every one of them, but the issues he raised and the questions he asked proved extraordinarily valuable. No member of the executive branch could leave that hearing without having an added respect for the Senate and for the function that we perform in not only the writing and drafting of legislation but oversight of our policy. It was one of the high points in my Senate career to listen to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

Let me make clear that the debate today was started on the floor of the Senate with the majority leader and the minority leader taking very, very active roles. They recognize the importance of it.

Mr. President, to save time, I ask unanimous consent that my answer to the question: Is this resolution another Gulf of Tonkin resolution? be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the response was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Gulf of Tonkin Resolution was much more open-ended. The current Resolution is much more limited in scope.

The 1964 Tonkin Gulf Resolution stated that the President was authorized not only to defend U.S. forces against attack, but also to "take all necessary measures . . . to prevent future aggression" and "to take all necessary steps, including the use of armed forces, to assist any [SEATO] member . . . requesting assistance in defense of its freedom." This was a very broad statement, since it was generally accepted at the time that North Vietnamese and other Communist forces were using massive combat forces to commit aggression throughout Indochina.

In contrast, the mandate authorized by the current Resolution is much more limited in scope. Section 3 of the Resolution clearly states that the authorization granted for the continued participation of U.S. forces in the MNF will be limited to performance of the functions set forth in the September 1982 exchange of letters between the U.S. and Lebanese Governments, and will be subject to the limitations stated in those letters. That means that U.S. forces are not authorized to undertake a combat role, but only to help provide a multinational presence that would assist the Lebanese Government in the Beirut area.

Of course the Resolution recognizes that our forces are not precluded from taking such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the MNF. This has always been the case, and this right of self-defense is essential for any force of this kind. But it does not expand the basic role and mission of the force: Congress is not being asked to authorize the President to use military force to expel foreign forces from Lebanon, or to reoccupy those parts of Lebanon now controlled by non-Government elements, or to intervene on behalf of the Lebanon Government to suppress internal Lebanese factions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EVANS). The time for debate has expired.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period of 5 minutes for the transaction of routine morning business in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all Senators for their participation in the debate today. If I appeared anxious to conclude, it was because earlier today an order was entered by unanimous consent that limited the time for debate on the war powers resolution from 3 p.m. until 5 p.m. I felt that we should abide by the terms of that arrangement since the act provides for the division of time equally, and that was the arrangement that was made with the minority leader on behalf of many Senators.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 1888. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide for due process requirements for the termination of disability benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY REVIEW

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have been deeply concerned about the content of letters which have been coming into my office for the last year. These letters contain touching and heart-rendering stories of families who are losing their homes, who no longer can afford life-sustaining medicine and who are being deprived of much needed doctor's attention because of what they believe are unjustified cutoffs of their social security disability benefits.

I have heard from a poor woman who has an incurable heart and lung disease and is struggling to raise a child by herself. This woman cannot walk up a flight of steps without incurring severe physical consequences. Her bad health and lack of physical capacity has prevented her from finding employment, yet social security cut off her monthly disability support putting her in jeopardy of losing her home.

Another example of the extreme problems in the social security review system was the cutoff of monthly payments to a woman struck down with a progressive, deterioration muscle disease caused by the swine flu vaccine. This woman used her small amount of disability funds to buy medicine, without which she would die. I have been trying to help these and similar people on an individual basis, but, unfortunately, arbitrary disability cutoffs of this kind have persisted.

I had sincerely hoped the problems with social security disability would have been addressed and remedied last January when Congress focused their attention on the social security system. I introduced legislation at that time which would have put an end to erroneous cutoffs of the livelihood of helpless people.

Congress approved some—but not all—of my social security proposals at that time. Unfortunately, my proposal for a guide for disability review was one of the elements not adopted. Therefore, with this major problem still facing the American public, I believe it is imperative that I reintroduce that important segment of my former bill.

I would be the first to acknowledge that there has been much abuse of social security disability, but, the movement to correct the abuse must have guidelines and it must be fair. I propose that Congress insure due process to every individual disability recepient before any benefits can be cutoff. The bill I am introducing today, entitled "Social Security Disability Guidelines," will do this. Under the legislation, each disability beneficiary would be entitled to a hearing before an administrative law judge before benefits could be stopped. The Social Security Administration could bring a case before a judge for determination only after showing the claimant either: one, had a physical or mental medical improvement or two, was subject to a mistake in the initial determination of disability or three, had perpetrated a fraud on the social security system in claiming his condition disabled him from all work activities.

This is a much needed change in the social security disability system. The problems involving the arbitrary cutoff of benefits to disabled citizens must be addressed. We cannot allow life-sustaining funds for so many individuals to continue to be terminated by an overzealous Social Security Administration. Each beneficiary's individual situation must be thoroughly reviewed before action is taken. The seriousness of this issue is indicated by the fact that administrative law judges have reversed roughly 70 percent of the disability cutoff cases they review. I sincerely urge my colleagues to look toward solving the root of the disability problem. Another temporary measure to extend payments without setting forth appropriate guidelines, as adopted last year, is not the answer. Let us move now to prevent disabled, deserving Americans from living in fear of losing their only means of support. I urge you all to work quickly to pass this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1888

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, (a) section 221(d) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "(1)" before "(c)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) In any case where—

"(i) an individual is a recipient of disability insurance benefits, or of child's, widow's, or widower's insurance benefits based on disability, and

"(ii) a preliminary finding is made that the physical and mental impairment on the basis of which such benefits are payable has ceased, did not exist, or is no longer disabling (as determined in accordance with subparagraph (B)), such benefits may not be terminated until such preliminary finding has been upheld after a hearing by the Secretary as provided in section 205(b). The Secretary shall provide opportunity for such hearing at a time and place reasonably accessible to the individual. Failure without good cause to appear at such hearing shall constitute a waiver of the right to such a hearing prior to termination.

"(B)(i) Except as provided in clause (ii), no benefits described in subparagraph (A) may be terminated on the grounds that the physical or mental impairment on the basis of which such benefit was payable has ceased, did not exist, or is no longer disabling, unless the Secretary makes a finding that there has been a medical improvement in the case of such individual's impairment such that the individual is no longer under a disability under the standards for disability in effect at the time of such prior decision, or that the prior decision that such individual was under a disability was clearly erroneous under the standards for disability in effect at the time of such prior decision.

"(ii) Clause (i) shall not apply in the case of a termination of benefits based upon a finding made in accordance with section 223(d)(4) that services performed or earnings derived from services demonstrate an individual's ability to engage in substantial gainful activity, or to a termination based on a finding of fraud.".

(c) Section 205(b) of such Act is amended by striking out "(1)" after "(b)" and by striking out paragraph (2).

(d) Section 5 of Public Law 97-455 is repealed.

(e) The amendments made by this section shall apply with respect to determinations (that individuals are not entitled to benefits) made after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 67

At the request of Mr. GORTON, the name of the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 67, a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that it is not appropriate at this time to transfer ownership or management of any civil meteorological satellite system and associated ground system equipment to the private sector.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 69—RELATING TO THE USE OF SATELLITE NAVIGATIONAL AIDS

Mr. PERCY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. CON. RES. 69

Whereas an unarmed South Korean commercial air transport plane was shot down on September 1, 1983, with the loss of 269 lives, including many American citizens;

Whereas the Korean Air Lines jet had apparently strayed off-course into Soviet-controlled air space;

Whereas the cause for the deviation from the plane's assigned route of flight is still under investigation and may never be known;

Whereas the current aviation system is safe if internationally recognized procedures are followed;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has arrogantly declared that in the future if another civilian aircraft strays off course and enters Soviet air space it would repeat its inhuman behavior, ignoring procedures developed to protect passengers;

Whereas there is an urgent need to provide pilots with additional navigational back-up systems to prevent aircraft from straying off-course and to protect passengers from becoming victims of the renegade behavior of the Government of the Soviet Union or other nations with similar disregard for the lives of innocent people;

Whereas the Department of Defense has developed the Global Positioning System (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as the "GPS") that can provide highly accurate navigational information to civilian aircraft as early as 1988;

Whereas the GPS could be implemented before the date to provide at least partial coverage near the borders of nations which have threatened and continue to threaten civilian airliners that may accidentally go off-course; and

Whereas commercial airlines and general aviation operators have opposed the imposition of a surcharge because it would set a precedent for the charging of fees for other navigational aids, and such operators have declared that they may not use the system if a surcharge is imposed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the Secretary of Transportation make available the civilian version of the GPS to domestic airlines and to the commercial airlines of those countries which strictly abide with both the spirit and letter of the International Air Services Transit Agreement, done at Chicago on December 7, 1944;

(2) the Secretary of Transportation should work with relevant agencies to speed up the timetable for the cvivilian use of the GPS in international air space; with particular attention to the use of such system in the North Pacific, including the availability of on-board receivers;

(3) the Secretary of Transportation should encourage both domestic and foreign-flag carriers to test the GPS before its operational implementation; and

(4) the Secretary of Defense should not consider imposing user fees for foreign and domestic civilian use of the GPS in view of the benefits of such systems to public safety.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the Secretary of Transportation and the Secretary of Defense.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I am submitting today a concurrent resolution that urges the administration to speed up the timetable to permit civilian use of the military navigational satellite system called the global positioning system (GPS).

A month has passed since the brutal action of the Government of the Soviet Union in destroying a civilian air transport plane, flown by Korean Air Lines.

Both the Senate and the House have passed strong resolutions condemning the action which killed all 269 passengers aboard. U.S. revulsion has been shared by the world community, including many nations that have responded by suspending air service to the Soviet Union.

Despite the marshaling of world opinion against the Soviet action, it appears that the Soviet Government wants to dodge responsibility for this outrage. It has concocted ludicrous alibis.

It has publicly proclaimed that it intends ruthlessly to enforce its so-called border law and shoot down the next passenger plane that innocently strays across its borders.

Therefore, it is imperative that new "fail-safe" air navigational devices be used to aid pilots of commercial aircraft flying near Soviet borders. This would serve as an independent position monitor.

We are indeed fortunate because the Defense Department has successfully tested the GPS. When fully operational in 1988, it will provide around-the-clock, all-weather coverage for aircraft, anywhere on the globe. It can tell pilots where they are located within 300 feet, the length of a football field.

Let us not forget, as the President pointed out to the United Nations today, scores of Soviet planes have strayed from their course. We have never shot them down. They have strayed right over U.S. sovereign territory. We have warned them; we have gone through the procedures that any civilized nation would; we have even caused them to land to explain what they were doing there. But we did not shoot them down. Now, no excuse exists for their straying. We have the technical capability—when all 18 satellites are in the air, 11,000 miles above Earth, we shall be able to monitor, every place on Earth, every single airplane. There is no use just doing this for defense; why not do it for civilian aircraft as well? We are fortunate that we are as far along as we are and that the system has proven out to be as accurate as it has.

One plane took off from Des Moines, Iowa, I believe it was, and landed in Paris, used only this directional system, and it landed within 26 feet, on a Paris airstrip, of where it was intended to be landed, never being touched by human hands, all done by automatic procedures. That is the competence and the capability that is now available to us for civilian aircraft.

Technical experts believe that the GPS timetable can be advanced to provide 15-hour-a-day coverage over the North Pacific Great Circle route in a year. In view of the threat to civilian aviation on that route, I would urge that the Defense Department and the Federal Aviation Administration work together to provide this additional navigational check by early 1985.

One of the primary purposes of this resolution is to put Congress on record in favor of continued momentum toward civilian use of the GPS. All too often after a disaster, public attention shifts to the next pressing crisis, and necessary corrective measures are delayed or never implemented. In view of the Soviet attitude, we cannot afford that luxury.

Mr. President, I would ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Chicago Sun-Times urging a speedup in the GPS timetable, together with articles from the same newspaper and the Philadelphia Inquirer. I would also like to submit for the record information about the GPS, prepared by Rockwell Collins, a GPS contractor.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIFE-SAVING IDEA

Sen. Charles H. Percy (R-Ill.) has a good idea to help prevent another tragedy like the brutal downing of the Korean airliner that strayed into Soviet airspace.

Percy asked President Reagan to speed up steps that will make new military navigation aids available to all civilian aircraft flying near Soviet borders on their way to the Orient.

The additional use of the satellite navigation system, scheduled to be fully deployed by 1988, won't involve any extra cost to taxpayers. But it can help keep airliners on a more accurate course across the treacherous northern Pacific skies.

PERCY URGES MILITARY-SATELLITE AID IN AIRLINE NAVIGATION

(By William Hines)

WASHINGTON.—Sen. Charles H. Percy called on President Reagan Thursday to make new satellite-based military navigation aids available to commercial aviation as a means of preventing a reoccurrence of the Sept. 1 Soviet destruction of a South Korean jumbo jet.

Percy, as Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman, said in a letter to Reagan that immediate and effective countermeasures should be taken to warn civilian airliners of their precise position in relation to Soviet borders."

Percy pointed out that a military satellite network, the Global Positioning System, is in the early stages of deployment, with six of the planned 16 satellites in orbit and undergoing development testing.

"I have been told that, GPS satellites now in orbit could be used within one year to provide coverage 16 hours per day for civilian airliners flying the great circle route to the Orient" Percy wrote. "They would provide a valuable backup to existing on-board navigational systems."

He noted that the Defense Department "has supported commercial use of the GPS" and that such use would not cost the taxpayers anything.

At the White House, a spokesman said Reagan is considering making the GPS available to commercial jets. The spokesman said Federal Aviation Administrator J. Lynn Helms had asked as much earlier in the day in response to a press conference question at a meeting of the International Civil Aviation Organization in Montreal.

The military satellite network is scheduled to be in full operation by 1988, with 16 satellites circling the globe. The Defense Department reportedly has said the system could be used by civil aviation beginning in 1988, but the Soviet destruction Sept. 1 of the Korean Air Liner 747 jet has lent urgency to earlier availability.

Navigation by satellite has been a top-priority military objective since the earliest days of the Space Age because of the accuracy such a system can provide. With the GPS in place, it will be possible for a plane in flight to know its position instantly to within about 50 feet, and its speed to within a quarter of a mile an hour.

U.S. WILL GIVE WORLD ITS NEW AIR NAVIGATION SYSTEM

WASHINGTON.—Prompted by the Korean airlines tragedy, the United States will make available to the world's commercial airliners an advanced navigation system now under development by the government, the White House said yesterday.

Deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes told reporters that the Global Positioning System was expected to begin operating in 1988. It is designed to give pilots more accurate information on latitude, longitude and altitude and help keep them from straying off course, Speakes said.

He said the Reagan administration's move was prompted by the Soviet downing of Korean Air Lines Flight 007 on Sept. 1 and the desire to see that such an action did not happen again. The plane was hundreds of miles off course when it was shot down.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Charles H. Percy (R., Ill.) had recommended the move in a letter to President Reagan on Thursday, but said the system could be used sooner than Speakes indicated.

Reagan's overall restrained response to the tragedy has generally been praised. That was reflected in a New York Times-CBS poll published yesterday that said 55 percent generally supported Reagan's response but 56 percent said he should have been tougher.

The poll also showed that 61 percent of the 705 adults surveyed said they felt that the U.S. government was "holding back information that people ought to know."

The telephone survey, taken Wednesday night, showed that half the respondents favored halting grain sales to the Soviet Union to retaliate, 40 percent opposed such a step, and 9 percent had no opinion.

Meanwhile, the Agriculture Department announced yesterday that the Soviets had purchased more U.S. grain—250,000 metric tons of wheat and 125,000 tons of corn—for delivery in 1983-84 under the terms of a long-term agreement signed last month.

That pushed the estimated value of Moscow's purchases since Sept. 1—the day the Soviets shot down the jetliner—to more than half a billion dollars.

That purchase, one on Sept. 1, the day of the shooting, and related deals since that day were disclosed in terse announcements that noted only the amount of grain involved and the delivery date. None of the announcements, which have come at the rate of three or four a week, mentioned the airliner or the administration's outrage at the Soviets.

Another finding of the Times-DBS poll was that respondents rejected, by a 2-1 ratio, such retaliatory measures as breaking off arms control talks or diplomatic relations.

However, conservatives appearing at Republican-sponsored hearings at the Capitol called for a tougher response.

John Fisher, president of the American Security Council, said the Soviets had gained "significant nuclear and conventional military superiority" because the United States had "neither a goal nor a strategy in this conflict."

"We must spend whatever is necessary to rebuild a superior war-fighting capability," Fisher siad. "That is the most cost-effective approach—deterrence is cheaper than war."

NAVSTAR GLOBAL POSITIONING SYSTEM—FACT SHEET

The system is comprised of three segments:

1. Satellite constellation circling the earth
2. Ground control stations which monitor the satellites and transmit data to the satellites
3. User segment—all land, sea and air users which receive position, velocity and time information.

GPS ACCURACY

Position accuracy within 16 meters in three dimensions.

Velocity accuracy within 0.1 meters per second.

Time accurate to within one-millionth of a second.

BACKGROUND

The Navstar Global Positioning System is a Department of Defense program administered by the Space Division of the U.S. Air Force. The system is currently undergoing operational testing and evaluation by the Air Force.

MAJOR CONTRACTORS

Satellites—North American Space Operations of Rockwell International Corporation.

Ground Control Stations—IBM Federal Systems Division.

User Equipment—Collins Government Avionics Division of Rockwell International Corporation and Magnavox Corporation.

WHEN

Currently six satellites are orbiting the earth for development testing. When the system is operational in 1988 it will consist of a network of 18 satellites. Users equipped with GPS receivers will know their location within 10-20 meters anywhere in the world, in any weather.

GPS OPERATION

When the GPS set is turned on, an estimate of present position, velocity and time is entered. The GPS set then begins to track the nearest satellites and provide position information to the operator. The system is relatively immune to operator errors since once it tracks the satellites all position information comes from the satellites and the system disregards the operator's initial estimate of his position.

STATEMENT BY THE PRINCIPAL DEPUTY PRESS SECRETARY TO THE PRESIDENT

In their recent statements on the Korean Airlines tragedy, senior Soviet officials have shocked the world by their assertion of the right to shoot down innocent civilian airliners which accidently intrude into Soviet airspace. Despite the murder of 269 innocent victims, the Soviet Union is not prepared to recognize its obligations under international law to refrain from the use of force against civilian airliners. World opinion is united in its determination that this awful tragedy must not be repeated. As a contribution to the achievement of this objective, the President has determined that the United States is prepared to make available to civilian aircraft the facilities of its Global Positioning System when it becomes operational in 1988. This system will provide civilian airliners three-dimensional positional information.

The U.S. delegation to the ICAO Council meeting in Montreal, under the leadership of FAA Administrator J. Lynn Helms, is urgently examining all measures which the international community can adopt to enhance the security of international civil aviation. The United States is prepared to do all it can for this noble aim. We hope that the Soviet Union will at last recognize its responsibilities, and join the rest of the world in this effort.

NAVSTAR GLOBAL POSITIONING SYSTEM—COLLINS USER EQUIPMENT

Navstar—a revolution in navigation. For thousands of years man has looked to the stars to guide his travels. Beginning in 1978 some new stars were placed in orbit 11,000 miles above the earth. These Navstar satellites are transmitting signals that provide a user three-dimensional navigation and the precise time worldwide. By the late 1980's the operational Navstar system of 18 satellites will be aiding users throughout the world and saving time, energy, money and lives.

Current navigation systems such as Loran and Omega are plagued with coverage gaps and frequency shifts after sundown. Inertial navigation systems are accurate when first programmed but the longer the system operates without updating, the larger the errors in position become. Navstar, on the other hand, has typical accuracy of 16 meters in three dimensions, the correct time within one-millionth of a second and the user's velocity to the nearest one-tenth of a meter per second.

GPS SYSTEM ACCURACY

Navstar GPS can determine position, velocity and time with a greater degree of accuracy than any current system. Widely-accepted accuracies for various navigation systems are shown in the table.

This degree of accuracy is not obtainable from any other navigation system available today or in the foreseeable future.

Benefits available to military and civilian users include: reducing costs of operation through efficient navigation and improved management of resources in a variety of applications. In the civilian community, GPS will improve aircraft traffic flow, improve the accuracy of geodetic surveys, enable better prediction of earthquakers and precise mapping of the seas for energy exploration. Many additional productivity improvements will be discovered as the system comes into day-to-day usage.

On the military side, one study predicted that GPS could be worth the equivalent of a $50 billion investment in additional weapons systems.

HOW IT WORKS

The Navstar Global Positioning System is comprised of three segments: 1. The space segment—the constellation of satellites circling the earth. 2. The control segment—a series of ground stations which monitor the satellites and transmit corrected position and time data to the satellites. 3. The user segment—all sea, air and land equipment which receives the statellites signals and calculates user position, time and velocity. The user segment can receive the signals anywhere in the world, in any weather, without transmitting any information, making GPS an ideal millitary navigation system. The signals are designed to be jam-resistant.

THE USER SEGMENT

The navigation requirements of the user will determine how sophisticated the Navstar system must be. Collins Navstar GPS systems are available with one-, two- and five-channel receivers. Generally, single-channel systems are designed to be used in ground situations, in a backpack, truck or light vehicle. Two-channel systems find applications on helicopters, transport aircraft and surface ships. Five-channel systems are designed for supersonic aircraft and users with complex requirements.

GPS OPERATION

Basic operation of any GPS system is very similar. When the GPS set is turned on, an estimate of present position velocity and time is entered. The GPS set then begins to search for and track satellites. The data coming from the satellite signals does several things. It identifies the satellite number, locates the satellite in space and establishes system time. The GPS receiver then calculates the range to the satellite by measuring the time of receipt of the signal and multiplying that time by the speed of light. The result of this calculation is that the user has been located on a sphere of radius R1 whose center is the transmitting satellite.

With the range to one satellite known, a range measurement is made to a second satellite to define a second sphere of range R_2 Range R_3 is also determined by measurement to a third satellite. Using the three range measurements and elementary geometry the GPS set determines that point which is the users precise position in terms of latitude, longitude and altitude. Range to a fourth satellite is required to determine the time offset from the users crystal clock with respect to the GPS atomic time standard. The velocity measurement is determined by counting the doppler shift from the GPS center frequency.

Each satellite transmits two L-band signals: L_1 is 1575.42 MHz and L_2 is 1227.6 MHz. Both signals contain data which includes satellite location; thus the range to the satellite can be determined by the GPS set by comparing the time delay between satellites. The precise latitude, longitude, altitude, velocity and time can be determined for an unlimited number of system users.

GPS Navigation Modes: Collins Navstar Global Positioning User Systems are capable of operating in an autonomous mode or they can interoperate with other navigation systems such as inertial and doppler radars.

Figure-of-Merit: A "Figure-of-merit" number from one to four is displayed to the GPS user as an estimate of the GPS system performance. The higher the number, the lower the comparable performance of the system. The figure-of-merit is based upon the following criteria:

User equipment status and performance.

Jamming-to-signal ratio.

Receiver channel tracking loop performance.

Receiver operating state and navigation mode.

Time correlation of GPS-derived navigation data.

Correlation between GPS and aiding navigation system.

Satellite constellation performance.

INPUTS AND OUTPUTS

Typical GPS Inputs:

Satellite signals.

Position, velocity, altitude, acceleration and attitude—from aiding navigation system.

Waypoints—entered from a control-display unit or data loader.

Aiding navigation system mode and status data.

Typical GPS Outputs:

Position, velocity and time.

Altitude (mean sea level or absolute).

Steering information—track angle, cross track error.

Time and distance to waypoint.

Groundspeed and groundtrack angle.

Elevation angle to waypoint.

True magnetic hearing.

Magnetic variation.

Calendar and time-of-day.

Test and status data.

Interfact characteristics are dependent on the type of installation, power and other requirements.

APPLICATIONS

Because the Navstar Global Positioning System is referenced to a common grid, the World Geodetic System 1972 (WGS-72), civil and military position data can be standardized on a worldwide basis. The user equipment can transform navigation information into other commonly used datums as well. The current military sets store 46 different datums. Military operations benefit in a variety of ways for guidance, rendezvous, reconnaissance, and targeting operations. Civil applications as well can benefit from the total GPS worldwide coverage, all-weather operation and the unlimited number of passive users that the system can support.

Potential commercial uses for aircraft, ground vehicles and sea-going vessels are practically unlimited. Search-and-rescue techniques can be enhanced, mineral exploration and geophysical survey crews can more accurately locate ore bodies and active fault belts in a shorter time. Precision airline or general aviation navigation anywhere in the world is possible, with approaches at nearly Category I standards. GPS could ultimately be used in airborne collision avoidance systems and maritime hazard avoidance systems.

As the system gains acceptance and is used in military and civil sectors, more sophisticated uses for the system will be established. The Navstar Global Positioning System is truly the positioning and navigation system for today and tomorrow.

NAVSTAR 1 IS NUMBER ONE!

When Navstar 1 departed May 22 on its transatlantic flight using Global Positioning System (GPS) satellite signals as a principal means of navigation, darkness had fallen over the Cedar Rapids municipal airport. It was broken only by purplish-blue bulbs lining the runways, landing lights gleaming from the sleek blue-and-white business jet, and a narrow slice of the moon.

It was relatively quiet, too, until Collins Flight Operations Director Chuck Hall eased forward the throttles, sending Sabreliner N6NR screaming down the asphalt and into a starlit sky.

Navigating at night was nothing new to this crew of Hall; Chief Pilot Dave Selzer; veteran navigator Loren DeGroot, director of Avionics Systems for the Collins Government Avionics Division; and David Van Dusseldorp, the division's manager of GPS Manpack and Vehicular Engineering. Together, they had conducted extensive late-night taxi and flight tests, the hours dictated by signal coverage from five orbiting Navstar satellites. This same coverage, and its associated limitations, would necessitate enroute stops at Burlington, Vt.; Gander, Newfoundland; Reykjavik, Iceland; and Luton Airport, near London.

Now, joined by three others, the crew of Navstar 1—so named only 24 hours prior to departure—embarked upon its over-the-ocean journey: 11 hours, 15 minutes of flying which, in real time, would consume three days, 12 hours, 35 minutes.

Now they were seven; alone, flying mostly at night, watching their instruments, conversing with air traffic controllers, pausing to rest at some of the world's barren outposts. Left behind were the briefings, the press conferences, the blinding lights used by the television news crews, the seemingly endless demonstrations.

Now, everything was for real.

When they landed May 26 under overcast skies at Le Bourget Airport, site of the 35th Paris Air Show, Hall and Selzer had flown the Sabreliner 65 straight into the aviation record books.

More importantly, the crew had proven that a revoluntionary navigation system—still in its infancy despite nearly ten years of research and development activity—performs as advertised.

"I was totally impressed with the whole thing," said Selzer, after bringing Navstar 1 to a stop within 26 feet of a predesignated spot on the ramp at Le Bourget. "It was easy to fly; it just worked perfectly."

Echoed Hall, "The equipment performed flawlessly. But it took a maximum effort by the whole crew to make the flight a success."

The Navstar 1 crew members, admittedly operating to a large degree on adrenaline at the end of their 4,228-nautical-mile trip, were greeted with champagne, handshakes and congratulations from a reception party led by Collins Government Avionics Division Vice President and General Manager Richard E. Derr.

Then came the formal presentation of certificates by Col. Alex Rankin, observer for the National Aeronautic Association, which sanctioned the flight as an official attempt to establish new national and world records.

Concluded Selzer: "The timing was right for this flight. Two years from now would have been too late.

"We realize these records eventually will be broken, and that's okay. But we were the first—that's the important thing.

"How many people remember the name of the second U.S. astronaut to set foot on the moon?"

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on September 15, 1983, I wrote to President Reagan to urge that civilian carriers be permitted to use the GPS.

The letter reads as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D.C., September 15, 1983.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Now that both the United States Senate and House have officially condemned the brutal action of the Soviet Union in shooting down an airliner, further steps are necessary. The Soviet Union continues to show no remorse for its savage act of September 1, 1983. Quite to the contrary, it has arrogantly proclaimed that it will ruthlessly enforce its so-called border law, which is nothing more than a shoot-to-kill order against those who innocently stray over its borders.

I fully support and endorse your action taken in the aviation area against the Soviet commercial air carrier, Aeroflot. It is heartening to see so many of our allies—and even one neutral country—suspend landing rights for Aeroflot at the same time that their own national carriers have chosen to shut down service to Moscow. We must continue to raise our voices in international organizations until the Soviets decide to refrain from exposing to attack civilians flying near its borders.

I have already proposed to officials in your Administration an additional step to make clear the revulsion of the international community against the Soviet act. The United States, in my judgment, should organize opposition to the re-election of the Soviet Union to the Council of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO). As you know, ICAO is the principal international forum and policy-setter for civil aviation matters and includes 151 member countries. The Council is the chief governing body of the organization, whose 33 members are elected to three-year terms. That election should take place shortly after the organization opens its triennial meeting September 20, 1983, in Montreal. I believe that the Soviets should be denied the privilege of serving on the Council as another effective expression of condemnation by the rest of the world for their unjustified aggression against civil aviation. I urge you to direct United States representatives to take this position, as well as to seek a resolution condemning the Soviet act and calling for the payment of compensation to the families of the victims of this atrocity.

Additionally, until the Soviets agree to abide by current international procedures to ensure the safety of airline passengers, we should explore additional back-up systems to enhance navigation. Immediate and effective countermeasures should be taken to warn civilian airliners of their precise position in relation to Soviet borders.

The Department of Defense (DoD) has developed the Navstar Global Positioning System (GPS) that can tell pilots their precise position anywhere on the globe with a high level of accuracy. The civilian version of this system would permit commercial pilots to know their position within 300 feet or one football field, anywhere on the globe, regardless of the time of day or weather conditions.

Officials are confident that the Korean Air Lines flight would have been less likely to stray of-course if GPS had been operational and had been utilized. Full world coverage is expected to be available in 1988, when 18 satellites will be in orbit.

I would urge that the Defense Department move up the timetable so that coverage could be secured over the Great Circle Route to the Orient. I understand from technical experts that such coverage is possible within one year for at least 15 hours per day. This would provide a valuable onboard navigational system as a back-up to existing systems.

I understand that the user community is opposed to a fee being charged for the use of GPS. As this was not part of the law (although in the Report language), I see no reason for imposing the fee in view of the enormous benefits that would accrue to the civilian aviation community and the traveling public.

Mr. President, air travelers of all countries are rightfully concerned about their safety in view of the inhuman attitude taken by the Soviet authorities. The immediate utilization of the GPS could provide additional safeguards to protect the lives of innocent travelers.

Sincerely,

CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

EXTENSION OF FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION PROGRAM

COHEN (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2227

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. BOREN, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. QUAYLE) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 1887) to extend the Federal supplemental compensation program for 18 months, and for other purposes; as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

EXTENSION OF PROVISION ALLOWING PAYMENT OF DISABILITY BENEFITS DURING APPEAL

SEC. 9. Section 223(g)(3)(B) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "December 1, 1983".

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will be holding a hearing on Tuesday, October 4, 1983, at 9:30 a.m., in SD-608. The hearing will be on S. 1638, a bill to amend the act of June 24, 1983, to allow the Secretary of the Interior to invest certain funds collected by Indian irrigation and power projects.

Those wishing additional information should contact Max Richtman of the committee at 224-2251.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

FEDERAL SUPPLEMENTAL COMPENSATION AND THE USE OF THE TOTAL UNEMPLOYMENT RATE (TUR)

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, now that the Senate will be considering the further extension of jobless benefits, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the yardstick we use to measure the need for Federal supplemental compensation (FSC). We have two measures of unemployment called the total unemployment rate (TUR) and the insured unemployment rate (IUR). In the former we count all the unemployed; in the latter only those who are drawing regular State unemployment benefits. We base a State's eligibility for FSC on its insured unemployed rate, but that is not necessarily the right measure. The total unemployment rate used to run about 3 percentage points above the insured unemployment rate, back in 1981, but that relationship no longer holds.

The reason that we created the Federal supplemental compensation program is that in high unemployment periods it is unusually difficult for a large percentage of the population to find a job. We believed that the insured unemployment rate and the total unemployment rate correlated and that therefore the insured unemployment rate could be an appropriate measure of how difficult it was to find a job. We felt that States with a high insured unemployment rate should be eligible for more weeks of FSC than ones with a low insured unemployment rate.

The normal rule does not hold true any longer. The gap between the insured unemployment rate and the total unemployment rate is widening, as evidenced by the attached table. In my own State of Indiana, the civilian total unemployment rate, nonseasonally adjusted for July was 9.4 percent. The insured unemployment rate as of July 30, 1983, was 3.31 percent. It has since dropped further and thus makes this State with unemployment above the national average eligible for still fewer weeks of FSC.

Ironically the insured unemployment rate is not the best measure of hardship in the very States where unemployment is the most serious and the most persistent. Many of my colleagues have questioned the use of the insured unemployment rate as a trigger for FSC and I believe that we should recognize that those States which have unemployment above the national average must be included in the States with maximum duration of benefits.

I plan to offer such an amendment at the appropriate time.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a table which shows each of the States' total unemployment rate, insured unemployment rate, and the gap between the total and insured unemployment rates over a period of 1 year. This table not only details the monthly gap, but also gives the average gap between the total unemployment rate and the insured rate.

The material follows:

CLINCH RIVER—SECURING A FINAL VOTE

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, backers of alternative financing for the Clinch River breeder reactor project are now arguing that although their plan will end up costing the Government more than if Congress continued to fund the project through annual appropriations, if is still worth voting for because, if approved, the plan would end controversy about the project.

How the plan would do this is left unclear. All that the plan's proponents emphasize is that their plan provides an up-or-down vote on $1.5 billion in funding for the project. This amount, they note, should be enough to keep the project going for several years.

What they do not like speaking about, though, is that it is almost certain to prove insufficient to complete the project. Presumably, the Federal Government will be good for any further cost overruns several years from now and such funding will be noncontroversial.

They also are not keen on emphasizing that Congress may undo what it has done and that the Congress of 1984 will be a new Congress. Nor do they speak about the conservative groups, the taxpayer organizations, and environmental lobbyists who have vowed to continue to fight to terminate the Clinch River breeder reactor project even if the plan's proponents succeed in their attempt to end-run congressional procedure by attaching their plan to the continuing appropriations resolution.

The reason the plan's proponents do not like discussing these topics, of course, is that their airing undermines the proponents' contention that if we only give our vote this one last time, they will never have to come back for our vote again. This is simply not true and is a bad reason to approve a bad plan.

Indeed, if the Senate is anxious to secure a single final vote on the Clinch River breeder reactor project, there is only one way to do it—keep any legislation or new spending authorization for the project off the continuing appropriations resolution and demand instead that such legislation be submitted as separate legislation and considered under normal procedure.

If this is done, we will have one final vote on the project and I am certain that not only will the House clearly reject further support, but the Senate will also see the futility of further Federal support, and vote to terminate.

Mr. President, I am anxious that the Senate not be drawn in by promises of no more controversy. I am especially anxious that it not allow itself to be an accessory to a short circuiting of established legislative practice. Today, the Washington Post ran an editorial deploring the possible use of last-minute tactics to attach Clinch River legislation on to the continuing appropriations resolution. I ask that this editorial be printed at an appropriate place in the RECORD along with an American Nuclear Society nuclear report of August 4, 1983, that details how supporters of Clinch River should avoid a House vote.

The material follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 26, 1983]

END RUN TO CLINCH RIVER

The Clinch River Breeder Reactor project is in trouble—but its promoters, with characteristic ingenuity, may have found a way to keep it alive. Congress said earlier this year that there was to be no more money for Clinch River unless a better financial plan was enacted. The House has been voting against Clinch River by substantial margins, but it may still have a narrow majority in the Senate. The project's managers now seem to be preparing to attach a financial plan and further funding for the reactor to urgent legislation—perhaps the continuing resolution to keep the government operating after the fiscal year ends on Friday. The House might then find itself with a choice between accepting the continuing resolution, Clinch River and all, forcing most of the federal government into paralysis.

Those are tactics of desperation on the part of Clinch River's friends and advocates. But tactics of desperation sometimes succeed, and congressmen will have to keep a careful eye on this maneuvering. To allow the Clinch River construction to proceed through this kind of tricky last-minute parliamentary game would mean perpetuating a $4 billion error by the most dubious means.

Congress originally authorized the Clinch River reactor more than a decade ago. It was supposed to be the demonstration of the plutonium breeder technology on a large scale as the prototype of a generation of commercial breeders. But in recent years, the whole economic base for the project has eroded with huge new discoveries of uranium and the declining forecasts of the need for electricity.

That's why Congress voted earlier to turn the whole thing off, unless its backers could come up with a new financial scheme including greater support from private investors. The backers have come up with a scheme—and the Reagan administration has endorsed it—that claims to meet that requirement. But on closer inspection, private industry's support turns out to be mainly loans fully covered by federal guarantees and tax breaks. The director of the Congressional Budget Office, Rudolph G. Penner, testified last week that this alleged private support would cost the government more than conventional appropriations would.

That devastating testimony makes it very unlikely that the Clinch River breeder can now get further funding through the usual legislative route. But the end run remains a possibility. Whether it works will depend on the vigilance of the House leadership and particularly its Rules Committee. The degree of political skill and passion being devoted to the breeder reactor by its partisans is worthy of a better cause.

NUCLEAR REPORT

Hodel sent the CRBR alternative financial proposal to Capitol Hill on August 1, in time for it to be available to all Members of Congress, giving them an opportunity to discuss it with their constituents during the summer congressional recess, which begins this week and ends after Labor Day. (See NR of July 6 for a more detailed discussion of the proposal). The current strategy is to have the plan before the Congress for a suitable period, with public hearings on it scheduled for the middle of September. The proposal's legislative vehicle will be the continuing resolution to be prepared by the appropriations committees and submitted during the last few days of this fiscal year (before October 1) to appropriate FY-1984 money for ongoing programs not covered by previously enacted appropriations bills. A full appropriation of about $1.4 billion to cover seven years of construction (to project completion) will be offered in the continuing resolution. The CRBR item, most probably, will first be voted up or down in the Senate, where a scant majority in favor of project completion is believed to exist. Such a maneuver could seek to avoid a vote in the House, where "closed" rules often preclude votes on individual items in continuing resolutions.●

URGING SUPPORT FOR 1984 NATIONAL BUILDING SAFETY WEEK AND SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 70

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, this fall State and local building safety departments, architects, engineers, home builders, representatives of the building trades, and consumer groups will be meeting across our country to plan programs to participate in next April 8 to 14, 1984, National Building Safety Week.

Earlier this year, together with Senators JOHN TOWER, DONALD RIEGLE, Jr., and RICHARD LUGAR, I sponsored Senate Joint Resolution 70 designating the third week of April 1983 as the "Nation's First National Building Safety Week." That resolution is currently before the Senate Judiciary Committee for amendment to include the April 8 to 14, 1984, safety week dates and passage onto the full Senate for our consideration. As I have noted previously before this body, the purpose of National Building Safety Week is to focus public awareness on the important health and life-safety services which are available to all of us from our State and local professional building departments.

As the Senate Judiciary Committee begins consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 70, I would briefly like to highlight the accomplishments of last spring's 1983 National Building Safety Week program and describe the preparations which are underway for 1984.

On April 18 to 24, 1983, State and local building code departments in 32 States across the country held successful programs commemorating the Nation's first National Building Safety Week. Through radio and television public service announcements, newspaper articles, open houses, and exhibits, millions of Americans received important information on building safety. Residents of Indiana, for example, heard radio public service spots on the importance of the installation and proper maintenance of smoke detectors and received a five-part television news feature series on potential safety hazards encountered in home remodeling by the do-it-yourselfer.

In Minnesota, television viewers heard about the importance of having alternate means of escape from their homes in case of fire and radio listeners in Florida, Montana, Nebraska, Oregon, and many other States heard public service announcements on a number of other health and life-safety issues.

In New Jersey, building departments held exhibits and demonstrations on various aspects of building safety at shopping centers and malls throughout their State. In addition, State's Governors, mayors, State legislators, and city councils in over half of our States issued National Building Safety Week proclamations of their own.

Earlier this month, building officials, architects, engineers, and representatives from national organizations representing those parties involved in the construction industry met in Madison, Wis., during the annual meeting of the National Conference of States on Building Codes and Standards, Inc., to discuss cooperative efforts for next spring's National Building Safety Week. Among the activities approved at that session were the development of national public service spots on building safety, the development of a "Guide to Holding National Building Safety Week Functions," and the conducting of a 1984 National Building Safety Week Poster Design Contest which is currently underway.

As the building safety and construction community begins to plan their activities for April 8 to 14, 1984, I urge my colleagues in the Senate to express their support for this important national safety campaign by joining me in cosponsorship and passage of an amended Senate Joint Resolution 70.

As the safety week theme states, "Building Safety Is No Accident." As I have noted before, making our constituents more aware of and encouraging their increased participation in the building safety process, is an important concern to all of us in Congress. I ask your support for this important endeavor.●

TIME FOR EQUAL TREATMENT FOR COMPETITIVE INSURERS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I would like to express my support for the competitive insurance amendment being offered by my distinguished colleague from the State of Washington. Currently, U.S. insurers are frequently denied the right to compete for insurance business resulting from Eximbank financed sales and projects. Many, if not most, client countries invoke discriminating laws and business practices to direct the placement of this significant amount of business with insurance companies in their own countries.

I think this is a much needed and responsible amendment. This language is identical to the language which appears in the House bill. It does not require or guarantee preferential treatment for U.S. insurers. It simply requests Eximbank to work with U.S. insurers and other relevant U.S. Government agencies to promote equal and nondiscriminatory opportunities for U.S. insurers. The amendment, in effect, merely encourages adherence to the agreed upon principles of fair and nondiscriminatory access to foreign markets already incorporated in the GATT and other international trade agreements. Moreover, this amendment is an opportunity for the U.S. Government to demonstrate its resolve to eliminate nontariff barriers that inhibit the growth of our important service industries, as well as encourage free trade.

I want to congratulate my distinguished colleague for his work on this important issue and I urge passage of the amendment.●

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST HANDICAPPED PERSONS

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise to call my colleagues' attention to a most important and recent report. On September 15 the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights issued a comprehensive report documenting discrimination against disabled persons. The report, entitled "Accommodating the Spectrum of Individual Abilities" estimates that 9 to 14 percent of the American people—20 to 31 million people—are handicapped, either mentally, physically, or emotionally. The findings cited in the report include:

Unemployment rates for handicapped workers range from 50 percent to 75 percent, up from a prerecession rate of 45 percent.

Increased documentation that disabled workers perform satisfactorily or better in those job situations for which they are qualified.

Handicapped people face discrimination in the availability and delivery of medical services.

Currently 15 States have statutes authorizing compulsory sterilization of mentally ill or mentally retarded individuals, and at least four authorize the sterilization of persons with epilepsy.

Architectural barriers continue to present serious problems of inaccessibility. A 1980 study found 76 percent of State-owned buildings inaccessible and unsuitable for handicapped persons.

Handicapped people are frequently denied access to various means of transportation. For example, over 1 million physically disabled, blind, or deaf persons live within a short walk of transit services but cannot physically use them.

Other areas of discrimination against handicapped persons include voting, holding public office, and obtaining a driver's license.

Once again, the serious problem of discrimination against handicapped persons has been documented. As chairman of the Subcommittee on the Handicapped of the Labor and Human Resources Committee, I intend to examine this serious and far-reaching problem by conducting hearings on title V of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act in the spring of 1984. As you recall, title V includes provisions which prohibit discrimination against handicapped persons.

Mr. President, the Senate can take pride in the steps it has taken to preserve and enhance necessary services for and rights of disabled people. That justifiable pride, however, must not obscure the work that yet remains before us if we are to fulfill the promise of equal opportunity for American's disabled citizens. The Civil Rights Commission report provides a most valuable quide to where the Senate might direct its attention in this regard.

I urge my colleagues to give careful attention to the serious social problem of discrimination against handicapped persons as we approach next year's oversight hearings.●

POLAND'S SEPTEMBER

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I have risen many times in this Chamber to take note of significant events in Poland or in Polish history. Today, I rise to commemorate not a day, but a month.

The month of September holds a special place in the annals of Polish history. It was in September of 1683 that King John III Sobieski led his Polish knights to victory against the Turks. His triumph meant freedom for all Europe from Ottoman domination. Two weeks ago the Pope celebrated the tricentennial of that victory in Austria. Mr. President, we should acknowledge the significance of that battle, not only because it left Europe free to develop its own institutions, but also because, for one of the few precious times in history, it unified Western and Eastern Europeans against a common enemy of freedom. Since that time, Poland has had to struggle against divisive forces in Europe aimed directly at her heart.

Mr. President, September must also be remembered for less auspicious events in Polish history. In 1939, the German Nazi armies overran Poland and ignited World War II. That invasion held tragic meaning for the future of Europe and the Western World. As the catalyst for the bifurcation between East and West, it obliterated the possibility of common endeavor by European nations against foreign domination and tyranny.

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will join me in celebrating the first September event and lamenting the other. Let them both serve to remind us of the Poland that was, and, with our support, that may be again.●

TERMINATING CLINCH RIVER—A CLEAR BREEDER BARGAIN

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in recent testimony before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee proponents of the Clinch River breeder reactor project attempted to argue that it made no sense to terminate the project now that nearly $1.5 billion had been spent. Their argument was simple: We will lose all that we have invested and terminating the project now would cost nearly $300 million. In short, they would have us believe that we have gone so far already that we can only terminate at a price too high to consider.

The truth of the matter is quite different. As the project's backers themselves admit, $1.5 billion has been spent but the project's design work is over 90 percent complete and nearly half of the project's critical components have been acquired. If Congress terminates the project, these accomplishments remain. We can file the designs. And we can use the base breeder research and development test facilities in California, Washington, and Idaho to test the key components we have acquired.

Indeed, one of the most important components—the reactor's steam generators—has not yet passed testing and are the weakest link in the project's design. Since these generators are now available, they could be tested at modest cost as a part of the base breeder program to give us even more information about the soundness of the Clinch River design. In taking this approach, litle of what has so far been invested would be lost.

Certainly, if we began construction in earnest, we would gain no new design insights for our money; we would simply be paying construction firms to pour concrete and bolt existing parts together. This would be wasteful and it is just this sort of waste that our breeder program can ill afford.

Indeed, recently Energy Daily revealed that Secretary of Energy Hodel has been forced to cut the breeder program back. His Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy, Shelby Brewer, had asked for $643 million for breeder reactor work in fiscal year 1985—$331.5 million for the base breeder research and development effort, $285 million for Clinch River and another $26 million for the water cooled breeder effort. Secretary Hodel, however, wrote Mr. Brewer, August 22, 1983, that he could only have $331.5 million for all of these activities due to "the fiscal constraints which we must adhere."

Given these constraints, Mr. Hodel apparently is convinced that we have to make a choice between continuing Clinch River and keeping what he himself has stated is the key to our breeder future, our base breeder program, alive—for Hodel's statements concerning the nonessentiality of Clinch River see S 11513.

If, as Clinch River supporters claim, terminating Clinch River cost $300 million, we would have to pay it to keep the base breeder program alive. The good news, however, is that terminating the project would in fact, cost less than $150 million.

Why the discrepency? Simple: The termination cost figure Clinch River proponents use includes repayment of the utilities for their $158 million in contributions, a repayment that Government is not legally required to make.

In fact, the legal division of the Congressional Research Service determined that any utility suit to secure repayment of these contributions would almost certainly be thrown out of court.

It should be noted, that even $150 million for termination costs is probably high since the House Science and Technology Committee determined in May of 1981 that only $45 million would be required to terminate the project.

Mr. President, I believe the advantages to our breeder program of terminating the Clinch River breeder reactor project more than outweigh the advantages of proceeding with the project and I ask that the full text of the Energy Daily article and the Congressional Research Service legal finding be printed in the RECORD.

HODEL GOUGES THE BREEDER PROGRAM

If Energy Secretary Donald Hodel prevails, there will be no money at all in Fiscal Year 1985 for the so-called "base program" in breeder reactor development, which basically includes all breeder reactor R&D besides the Clinch River demonstration project.

Hodel's decision to drop the base program from about $340 million in fiscal year 1984 to basically zero in 1985 was taken as the agency prepared its budget for 1985, to be submitted to Congress next January as part of the President's overall budget request. In the course of the budget review, DOE's nuclear energy division requested about $643 million for breeder reactor development—roughly $285 million for the Clinch River breeder reactor (CRBR) project, $331.5 million for the base program, and $26 million for water-cooled breeders.

On August 22, Hodel informed his assistant secretary for nuclear energy that he could have just $331.5 million—to cover everything. In his memorandum, Hodel spoke of "the fiscal constraints to which we must adhere." Later, he directs that "the breeder reactor preliminary allowance of $331.5 million is to include funding for CRBR. The breeder base technology program should be reexamined and restructured to meet only the essential activities necessary to prepare for commercialization efforts beginning after the year 2005 at the earliest, and to maintain U.S. contact with the international breeder community."

Hodel's directive would basically force the Energy Department to close down the base program in liquid metal fast breeder reactors: $285 million for Clinch River plus $26 million for water-cooled breeders leaves only $20-21 million, a steep drop from about $340 million in the 1984 fiscal year. By any measure it is a draconian step. There are many in the nuclear community who would argue that the base program is the jewel in the crown, and more important to the technology's long-term future than the Clinch River project. The base program includes all the unspectacular but no less critical items, like component development and engineering, fuels and core design, materials and structures, basic physics and safety. The base program is also the source of funds for some large scale test facilities at the Fast-Flux Test Facility at DOE's Hanford, Wash. Lab the Energy Technology Engineering Center (formerly the Liquid Metal Engineering Center) in Santa Susanna, Calif., and several smaller projects at the Idaho National Engineering Lab including EBR-2 (a 20-MW sodium-cooled pool-type fast reactor) the Hot Fuel Examination Facility Zipper (the Zero Power Plutonium Reactor) and TREAT (a transit test reactor).

Subject: Overview of Legal Issues Governing Contract Liability in the Event of Termination under the Private Participation Contracts for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project.

This is in response to your request for an analysis of possible contractual liabilities which may arise under the participation agreements for the construction of the Clinch River Breeder Reactor (CRBR) among the United States, the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA), Commonwealth Edison Company (CE), the Project Management Corporation (PMC), and the many private utilities participating through the Breeder Reactor Corporation (BRC).

Special emphasis will be placed upon the legal obligation of the United States to reimburse the private utilities for their contributions in the event that Congress terminates the CRBR project by discontinuing funding therefor.

First, we will examine the termination provisions of the participation agreements. Second, we will explore the ramifications of a breach of contract by either the United States or the contributing utilities—recognizing, however, that making findings of breach of contract and awarding damages therefor is a judicial function. In the instant case, given the complexity of the contractual arrangements and the uniqueness of the CRBR project, coupled with your own time constraints, we will limit our analysis to an overview of legal issues.

I. THE PARTICIPATION AGREEMENTS

Two basic agreements form the basis for this analysis: The agreement for contributions between the utility industry through BRC and PMC (hereinafter "BRC-PMC contract");[1] and the participation agreement among the United States, TVA, Commonwealth Edison, and PMC (hereinafter "participation agreement").[2]

Section 7 of the participation agreement delineates the basis for project resources and costs. Subsection 7.1 acknowledges that the financial assistance or monetary obligations of CE and TVA are limited to the contributions delineated throughout the contract. Subsection 7.1.2 acknowledges pledged utility contributions through BRC, estimated at approximately $250 million. Subsection 7.1.1 refers by reference to section 4 to the responsibility of the Department of Energy's Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA), as successor to the contractual obligations of the United States through the Atomic Energy Commission, to seek continuing appropriations from Congress:

ERDA hereby assumes a continuing obligation to seek and to endeavor to maintain such legislative authorization (not necessarily limited to presently authorized authority or forms of assistance) and appropriations as may be required to enable the continued effective conduct of Project Activities, including funds to cover costs of or associated with turbine-generators and auxiliary equipment, the switchyard, and associated facilities.—Section 4.1.4.

Section 11 of the participation agreement deals with project termination.

It may be noted that rights and obligations under the BRC-PMC contract are incorporated by reference pursuant to subsection 11.1 of the participation agreement.

Among the grounds for termination are the following:

11.4.1.1 Any necessary governmental permit, license, authorization or approval required for the construction or operation of the Plant shall not have been secured within six months following the scheduled time for such action on ERDA's approved Project schedules, and the Project is seriously delayed or hindered thereby.

* * * * *

11.4.4. Upon consideration of all available resources including ERDA's efforts to obtain additional funds pursuant to paragraph 4.1.4, it appears at any time that there are or will soon be insufficient Project resources . . . to permit the effective conduct of the Project, including full satisfaction of anticipated commitments and contingencies.

Thus, it appears that the failure by Congress to appropriate continuing funding for the project constitutes grounds for termination of the project under the participation agreement.

Although three or more parties to the contract must agree that any one of the termination criteria have been met, they are obligated to exercise "good faith judgment", and it would be difficult to deny the existence of demonstrable fact.

In the event of termination, the participation agreement provides, inter alia, that PMC assign to ERDA all of PMC's rights, if any, to collect amounts due and unpaid as of the date of termination under the Utility Contribution Agreement (although no utility is obligated to make a payment which comes due subsequent to the date of termination). If PMC's allowable costs exceed its assets, ERDA is to be responsible for them. Section 11.5.1.

Upon termination, ownership of the liquid metal fast breeder reactor (LMFBR) demonstration plant is to inhere in ERDA, which has the right to use and dispose of the facility as it deems advisable. See section 10 of the participation agreement.

Under the BRC-PMC contract, in the event of wind-up, after all the project costs have been satisfied or reserved against, the proportionate share of contributions between the Atomic Energy Commission/ERDA and the contributing utilities shall be allocated: "There shall then be a settlement based upon the foregoing final accounting, and taking into account the actual amounts paid for Project Costs through the date of final accounting by the AEC, and by BRC, electric utilities and electric systems, to the end that there shall be made, out of remaining funds, (a) a refund to AEC of any credit balance in the AEC account and (b) a disposition by PMC, as directed by BRC of any credit balance in the Utility account."[3]

A review of the foregoing suggests that adequate Congressional funding for the CRBR project is a condition precedent to performance under the contract. The failure of Congress to authorize adequate funding is a contingency which constitutes grounds for termination of the project under the terms of the participation agreement.

In the event of termination, the BRC and contributing utilities are entitled to receive as settlement any unpledged funds in a proportionate ratio to the utility's contribution. There is no contractual provision for full refund of utility contributions to BRC.

II. BREACH OF CONTRACT

The CRBR project has suffered many delays in development, and as a result the estimated costs of completion have skyrocketed. Allegations of breach of contract have been leveled against the U.S. Government and the utility industry.

Apparently, representatives of the utility industry, testifying before Congress, have expressed their belief that the DOE's failure to aggressively seek funding from Congress during the Carter Administration constituted a breach of contract. One witness expressed the following theory:

"Mr. Hobelman [Counsel, BRC]. The authorizations referred to have not been achieved in prior years because prior representatives at DOE did not undertake their obligations under the contract to use their best efforts to push the contract and the project forward to completion.

"One of the reasons we are here today and one of the reasons an additional $850 million has been added to the cost of this project is that delay. In fact that is the principal reason for it.

"We therefore take the position that the obligations of the Government were not met in 1977 and 1978 and in subsequent years, and that therefore the contract was breached and therefore equitably and legally, and I hope here we are talking equitably today, is the responsibility on the Government to make the utilities whole and there-

[1] This analysis is based upon the reproduction of the PMC-BRC agreement set forth in "Closeout Costs, Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project," Hearing before the House Committee on Science and Technology, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 281 (1981).

[2] This analysis is based upon the reproduction of Modification No. 1 to AT (49-18)-12 which appears in Hearing, footnote 1 supra, at 119. Negotiated contract revisions subsequent to these agreements, if any, are not within the purview of the memorandum.

by provide the benefits of this contract in another fashion to their customers." [4]

Whether the DOE breached the contract by failing to pursue necessary funding will depend, in part, upon fundings of fact by a court hearing the matter.[5]

The U.S. Court of Claims does, however, have jurisdiction under the Tucker Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1491, as amended, to hear claims against the United States for breach of any express or implied contract. Likewise, Congress, in 31 U.S.C. § 724a, as amended, has appropriated sums necessary to pay judgments rendered against the United States.

But the notion that the U.S. Government will be responsible for restitution of all utility contributions in the event of a breach is but one theory of damages—one which may not necessarily be the most persuasive to a court hearing the matter.

Invariably, a court will examine the nature of the alleged breach—was it material, justifying recission of the contract, or was it immaterial. Congress itself is not bound by the contract to unended funding of CRBR, although ERDA officials are bound to use their best efforts to seek necessary appropriations from Congress. Thus, a court might want to explore the relationship between the Administration's failure to act and Congress' termination of funding to determine whether ERDA's actions were indeed a material breach of the contract.

A court may also entertain possible Government defenses to an allegation of breach, e.g., impracticability of performance or frustration of purpose, etc. It would look at the expectations of the parties under the contract, and would determine whether plaintiff utilities had received any of the anticipated benefits under the contract to date, and whether they exercised their duty to mitigate damage once breach had occurred.

Since the contract itself makes no provision for liquidated damages, nor does it provide full reimbursement to the utilities in the event of termination due to inadequacy of resources, one may seriously question whether a court would be disposed to award the full share of utility contributions as damages, especially in light of the disproportionate share of funding responsibility which has devolved upon the Government in conjunction with Clinch River. These are, however, questions which would be subject to litigation in a breach of contract action.

With respect to breaches by the contributing utilities, Article XVII of the BRC-PMC contract provides, in part:

(a) Any controversy, claim, counterclaim or dispute arising out of or relating to this Agreement or any breach thereof, shall be submitted to arbitration upon the request of either PMC or BRC in the manner provided herein . . . [6]

Thus, claims for contribution between PMC and BRC must first go to arbitration; and industry-wide failure to pay contributing shares may prove sufficient to deplete project resources in such a manner as to trigger the termination provisions under the participation agreement.

[5] A letter opinion of the Comptroller General indicates that Pub. L. 85-804 may or may not be a basis for U.S. Government liability under the CRBR contracts. See Hearing, footnote 1 supra, at 319. Consideration of this jurisdictional question is beyond the scope of this memorandum.

III. MISCELLANEOUS

You have also inquired as to the feasibility of requiring the utility industry to increase the ratio of their contributions to CRBR.

We can find no basis for such a unilateral action by the Government under the contractual agreements and conclude that such a new arrangement would have to be negotiated and agreed to by the parties themselves. However, nothing would preclude Congress from conditioning future appropriations upon increased utility participation.[7]

[7] We note parenthetically that CRBR authorizing legislation, Pub. L. No. 91-273, § 106, was amended by Pub. L. No. 92-84, § 105, to provide "that such assistance which the Commission undertakes specifically for this demonstration plant shall not exceed 50 per centum of the estimated capital cost of such plant".

THE U.S. INDUSTRIAL COUNCIL

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, during the past year I have become familiar with an exceptionally fine national organization, the U.S. Industrial Council. I know many of its members personally, and I had the opportunity to meet with its board of directors at its annual meeting this summer.

The U.S. Industrial Council is committed to the preservation and strengthening of the American free enterprise system, the rebuilding of a healthy economy, and the effort to sustain a strong national defense.

The council's Declaration of Policy outlines the principles and precepts of the organization's program. I commend it to my colleagues as an example of the clear thinking that motivates many fine American businessmen, and I ask that the entire text of the U.S. Industrial Council's Declaration of Policy appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The material follows:

IN GOD WE TRUST

The strength of our nation rests upon its spiritual foundation. The Founding Fathers of the United States clearly understood this basic reality of national life. Thus, in establishing the American institutions of government, they acknowledged Almight God as the ultimate source of strength.

The USIC is greatly concerned, therefore, over current trends inhibiting the free practice of religion and pushing the United States in the direction of purely secular society. The United States Industrial Council takes this opportunity—solemnly and humbly—to reaffirm its Faith in God, and to emphasize the importance of religion and the family structure as basic to public morality and love of country.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

INTRODUCTION

For fifty years the United States Industrial Council has maintained an unwavering and principled concern for our political and economic traditions during a half century that has incorporated unmatched disruptions in the political and economic order of the nation and the world.

The clear understanding that the USIC has had for its past, present and future directions is sharply reflected in its annual Declaration of Policy—a Council tradition. It is the written Declaration of Policy that has enabled the Council throughout the years to stand forthright on the issues—however unpopular or controversial—with the full support and working of its membership.

Within the past year, the USIC has structured a network of Advisory Task Forces composed from selected members—all experts in their respective industries—to mobilize and act upon the complex problems and mazed issues of the day. Each Task Force produces detailed white papers which relate the Council's positions and serve to bolster the parameters of the Declaration of Policy which give the guideline and framework for these studies.

The USIC Declaration of Policy is thus a forthright statement of what its membership believes to be the critical problems that will confront the country in the coming year based and built upon the experiences of more than a generation of thoughtful American businessmen. It is this Declaration to which is owed the continuity and consistency so evident in the fifty year history of the United States Industrial Council.

I. A STRONG AMERICA

The USIC wants this country's defense to be second to none, and favors a foreign policy that will protect our sovereignty, economic strength, and strategic interests.

Foreign policy and defense

The United States has made an important start at repairing its deteriorated defenses. It is essential, however, that the country not falter in its defense effort or cut back on programs which are only beginning to come into effect. The survival of the United States and its free society depends on demonstrated staying power.

Challenges are posed to the United States from several quarters, and these challenges will persist as far into the future as one can see. America's principal adversary, the Soviet Union, certainly has a long view in its development of policies aimed at weakening and ultimately destroying the capitalist world. The United States and the other democracies must take an equally long view and have the patience and tenaciousness required for the maintenance of freedom in the decades ahead.

It is essential that the United States not only develop and maintain weapons such as are necessary for security today but that it plan advanced defense systems that will meet America's security needs early in the 21st century. The American people must understand that they can't reach a plateau of security on which they can rest without worry or special effort.

The extent of the Soviet challenge has been underscored again in the past year as a result of worsening political conditions in Central America, where Soviet proxy forces have destablized an area that was quiet for many years. Aggressive, subversive activities in Central America pose a growing threat to stability throughout Latin America and, most importantly, to Mexico.

The story of organized protest in Western Europe in the past year also emphasizes the continuing effort of the Soviet regime to detach the NATO countries from the United States and to Finlandize that part of Europe which is not under Soviet control. Happily, the majority of West Europeans have not been drawn into the unilateral disarmament movement, but the strength of that movement, which benefits the USSR, is very disturbing to thoughtful people on both sides of the Atlantic.

The USIC is mindful of the enormous capacity of the Soviet Union to harness emotional protest movements in Western countries and use them to enhance the power position of the Soviet states, to demoralize Western countries and lead them to abandon defense and foreign policy measures on which the maintenance of freedom depends.

The Soviets long have held that "the front is everywhere," and Americans in and out of public life need a renewed and strengthened awareness of this fact. Thus the campaign for a nuclear freeze is on a parallel track with the campaign to end American aid to embattled El Salvador. Both campaigns have flourished in the U.S. because of shrewdly engendered fear of larger conflicts.

The USIC supports the principle of negotiations with the Soviet Union towards the end of achieving real reductions in nuclear weapons, but firmly opposes an agreement which would allow the Soviet Union to maintain nuclear superiority. An arms control agreement must include strict provisions for on-site verification.

The USIC also believes that the United States cannot afford to let Centeral America slide into the Soviet orbit or allow new Cuban-type regimes emerge in a region close to U.S. territory.

Maintenance of strong national security programs has been made much more difficult in the past year because of the weakening of the U.S. economy during the global recession. There have been many shortsighted appeals to cut defense programs in order to balance the budget. Important as that goal is, national security must have priority in the national agenda. If the United States is not able to deter foreign aggression, it will not be able to maintain a free economic system. Freedom is not just another budget item.

The American economy has improved in recent months, and there is reason to hope that other economics will respond to America's locomotive effect. Severe bumps in the free world economy are possible, however, in light of the tremendous burden of debt faced by many countries. Whatever the ups or downs in the free world economy, Americans and other free peoples must adhere to security programs which undergird freedom. Actually, the United States is in a very strong position, with tremendous technological advantages which can and must be maximized. The Soviets, for all their armed might, have a basically weak and inefficient economy. The chief task for the Western countries is not to allow themselves to be convinced that they can't afford to provide themselves with necessary defenses.

Support for military and diplomatic personnel and the flag

Throughout the world, Americans in uniform stand guard, protecting the national interest. It is fitting and proper that all who wear the uniform of the United States receive the respect and support of their fellow citizens. It is equally important that the flag, as the symbol of the republic, be honored at home and abroad, particularly at American embassies and other diplomatic installations.

II. LIMITED GOVERNMENT

Intrusive and costly government is a prime concern of nearly all our citizens. The USIC favors a return to the principle of limited government, in keeping with the spirit of our Founding Fathers.

Our federal system

The authors of the U.S. Constitution wisely created a federal republic. They believed that by dispersing power, and providing for checks and balances, they would endure the survival of our freedom.

Our Founding Fathers envisioned a political system where the role of government would be limited to defending the nation, upholding the rule of law, and performing essential functions that could not be left to the private sector. They never intended that the federal government should undertake to do anything that the states and localities could do just as well on their own.

In disregarding the wisdom of our founders, we have created an imperial government characterized by oppressive taxes, meddling bureaucrats, and nit-picking laws and regulations. Ironically, while the government's power grew enormously over private enterprise, private education, and private citizens, its ability to protect us from crime and to insure our enjoyment of basic rights is very much in question.

The USIC rejects the whole socialistic leveling philosophy of the welfare state as degrading to the rights and dignity of man. There can be no political rights without economic rights; neither can the Bill of Rights be interpreted piecemeal for the convenience of those who would make liberty secondary to equality. The Bill of Rights is an integrated document with every right of equal importance—including the right to bear arms and the rights protected by the Tenth Amendment.

Better government

With a view toward reclaiming our heritage, the Council makes the following specific proposals to Congress:

1. A real and immediate cut in the number of federal employees, including reform of Civil Service laws that preserve unnecessary federal jobs.

2. An evaluation of all federal regulatory agencies with the objective of abolishing the counterproductive ones and drastically curtailing the arbitrary powers of others;

3. The repeal of all so-called "voluntary programs" which force compliance and funding from the states by threatening to penalize them in other areas if they refuse to participate. The use of tax money taken from the citizens to blackmail the states if they refuse to participate in federal programs is unconstitutional and deplorable.

4. Continuing efforts to review the most expensive agency of the federal government, the Department of Health and Human Services, to reduce its excessive size, power, and cost;

5. The enactment of a "sunset law" that would require all federal agencies and/or programs to expire automatically after a given time of not more than five years unless extended by Congress;

6. The requirement of "economic impact statements" for all new federal programs or expansion of existing programs setting forth the cost/benefit to the taxpayer and any adverse economic consequences likely to ensue;

7. The reform of government pension programs to bring public pensions into line with those in the private sector. Not only are public pensions too high, but recipients may collect more than one. The USIC is gravely concerned over the growth of unfunded pension liabilities in the public sector. The actuarial deficiency should be stated each year as part of the budget process.

Political action and political reform

The Council takes specific notice of the fact that business and industry are entitled to the same privileges as organized labor in the formation and funding of political action committees.

The USIC believes that the financing of political campaigns with tax money is contrary to the spirit of a free society and incompatible with our federal system. Accordingly, we urge the repeal of the legislation which established such a system at the presidential level, and we strongly oppose current efforts to extend the system to congressional levels.

III. THE RULE OF LAW

Our citizens should be secure against those who would violate their persons or their property, whether they be criminals, overzealous bureaucrats, or activist judges.

Crime and violence

The USIC endorses tougher measures to deter all forms of criminal behavior. It commends those state legislatures that have restored the death penalty as a deterrent to specific crimes.

Yet it is the swiftness and certainty of punishment, more than its severity, that deters. Methods of detection and apprehension should be improved, and criminal proceedings should be streamlined to the extent that justice permits. Plea bargaining should be eliminated, and admissibility of evidence should be based upon its accuracy, not whether it has been "tainted" by some irregularity in procedures. Illegal acts committed in the course of obtaining evidence should be prosecuted separately.

The USIC strongly supports federal and state efforts to apprehend and convict drug peddlers and to enact tougher penalties for persons engaged in the illegal drug traffic. At the same time, the USIC vigorously opposes legalization of marijuana. Available evidence shows that marijuana often is the prelude to use of hard drugs and, in addition, induces in users a detachment from reality and indifference to moral values and personal obligations. The USIC holds that authorities must do everything possible to prevent America becoming a drugged society. The Council also supports sound and successful efforts to rehabilitate drug users.

Another major problem is that of pornography. The Council urges strong laws at the federal and state level to halt the growing traffic in pornography that debases the quality of American life.

We also urge businessmen to refrain from advertising in publications that are clearly pornographic, or that promote crime and violence.

While urging stricter law enforcement, the Council also favors enlargement and modernization of prison facilities as funding is available. Because of serious overcrowding in prisons, judges often hesitate to jail offenders. If adequate facilities were available, and prison authorities were able to separate youthful offenders from hardcore criminals, the prison systems could be used more efficiently to deter crime, to rehabilitate convicted persons, and to help them equip themselves for self-supporting and law-abiding lives. The Council recommends that prisoners be required to perform useful tasks while serving their sentences in order to provide restitution to victims of their crimes.

The USIC urges the subcommittee on terrorism and subversion in the Senate Judiciary Committee to increase its efforts to investigate terrorist and subversive activities in the United States.

The Federal judiciary

It is encouraging that the Supreme Court is turning away from the judicial activism which characterized it for many years and which, in the view of many Americans, violated the intent of the framers of the Constitution, produced serious strains in our society, and weakened the administration of justice. However, the Council regrets that the High Court has nevertheless upheld a number of unwise decisions by the lower federal courts concerning public education. In addition, federal judges have set up unrealistic guidelines and standards for state prisons.

Specifically, the Council objects to the judicial notion that public schools are primarily instruments of social change. Court-ordered busing and racial balancing have served only to destroy the harmony which once prevailed in the schools, to impair the education of millions of school children, and impose additional costs on taxpayers. The USIC calls for an end to such judicial experimentation and the return of schools to the control of the states and localities, by constitutional amendment if necessary.

Similarly, the Council, decrying the current trend toward atheism and moral anarchy, supports the restoration of voluntary prayer and Bible reading in the public schools by constitutional means.

The Council recommends that a mandatory retirement age for federal judges be established.

IV. A FREE ECONOMY

A free economy is essential to a free country. It is also the basis for national prosperity. However, the opponents of economic freedom have not eased the pressures for continuation and even expansion of government policies that have reduced economic freedom for many Americans. Economic difficulties of recession, unemployment, and the decline of several of our major industries have renewed the demands for a return to the massive government role in the economy, including expansionary monetary policies, huge social welfare programs and other domestic policies that are the cause of America's economic problems.

The USIC believes that the nation can only return to its traditions of prosperity, high employment, and genuine economic growth by standing firm on the principles of economic freedom, which include drastically reduced federal spending, continuing efforts to reduce regulation of business, and a consistent monetary policy.

Private property and free enterprise

The United States Industrial Council firmly supports the concept of property as the foundation of personal liberty. The USIC urges protection of the property right of the American people.

Current activities by anti-business groups disclose a studied effort to separate control from ownership of property and, in effect, to limit and qualify property rights of corporations and shareholders. The current insistence in some quarters that corporations name so-called "public" directors—spokesmen for unions and consumers—is part of the effort to restructure the traditional American concept of property rights.

It is clear that there is a major effort afoot to deny investor-owned companies the right to make key decisions affecting their operations. The anti-business groups seek to deny business decision-making power regarding plant location or relocation, product selection, source of supply and advertising. There is a campaign underway to compel companies to disclose essentially proprietary business information. Forces of free enterprise urge Congress to authorize severe penalties, including jail terms, for company executives who violate new social guidelines.

A federal law should preempt state laws only where the law expressly states that it is the intent of Congress to do so, when the constitution so empowers. Federal courts now exercise too much discretion in deciding whether or not a federal law preempts state laws covering the same area. Congress should not allow the courts to second-guess its intentions in this fashion.

Legislation has been proposed at state and federal levels to penalize companies that wish to relocate, thus making them "captive industries." If a state is losing businesses because its taxes are too high, its regulations too rigid, and its labor-management policies too solicitous of big unions, imposing an exit tax on departing corporations will not improve its economy or that of the nation as a whole. It can only lead to more business closings and more unemployment.

The USIC believes that the managerial functions of business should be discharged by the chosen representatives of the stockholders and investors—i.e., by those who bear the risk of loss and are entitled to the profits.

Profits and the concomitant risk of loss make the free enterprise system run; they are the dynamics, the driving forces of industrial progress. Without profits, there would be no investment to provide new jobs and additional opportunities for the growing work force of an expanding population. A no-profit economy inevitably results in a socialistic economy.

A pure free market, free enterprise economy is without equal in providing the greatest selection of goods and services at the least possible cost. Free enterprise means the right to succeed and the right to fail. Successful enterprises should not be penalized by government for their success, and unsuccessful enterprises should not be kept in operation with transfusions of tax dollars.

Government attempts to rescue failing corporations opens the door to vast subsidy operations and to indirect control of private companies by directors nominated by government. The business community should take the lead in opposing such bail-outs, as they undermine the free enterprise system.

Capital formation and tax reform

Rapid capital formation is the key to a prosperous economy. Unfortunately, capital formation has been discouraged in the United States.

Clearly, if free enterprise is to survive and the nation to enjoy a high standard of living, capital formation must be encouraged. Citizens must be given incentives for investing instead of spending.

The creation of such incentives means allowing citizens to retain their earnings. Therefore, the USIC believes in tax reform consistent with the principles of free enterprise. Our specific proposals in this area include the following:

1. The elimination of double taxation of corporate profits. At the present time, such profits are taxed as corporate income, and then again as personal income when paid to shareholders as dividends.

2. The adoption of adequate tax incentives, to replace and increase those formerly provided by the oil depletion allowance, to encourage exploration and development of domestic petroleum supplies.

3. A constitutional amendment setting a fixed ceiling on the rate at which federal income, estate, and gift taxes can be levied and collected, except on income taxes in time of congressionally-declared war.

4. A less restrictive business tax structure: to stimulate production and increase job opportunities. This should include the reduction and eventual elimination of capital gains taxes.

5. An evenhanded approach to the regulation of tax-exempt organizations and contributions; the withdrawal of tax-exempt status from any organization that promotes lawless and destructive ends.

6. The elimination of unfair tax advantages presently enjoyed by cooperatives, credit unions, and labor unions. These organizations are now using tax-free income to engage in a number of large, profit-making enterprises in competition with taxpaying enterprises.

7. A reduction of government spending with an appropriate lowering of personal income taxes.

Government economic policy and inflation

Thus the USIC holds firm in the conviction that the destructive forces of inflation, present and anticipated, and resultant high interest rates and thus the related problems of unemployment, widespread business bankruptcies, and general economic decline, are the consequences of government deficits.

The past two years have seen remarkable success in the lowering of inflation, which is one of the most important governmental achievements in this period, but renewed inflation is likely if federal spending is not contained. Even with essential defense spending increases, it is possible to make massive cuts through better management, as the Grace private sector task force reported, saying that $48 billion could be saved over three years.

The Council has always held that there is a definite and undeniable link between inflation and deficit spending by the federal government. Therefore, the Council deplores attempts to explain away or to ignore deficits as unimportant or unrelated to our nation's economic well-being.

The government's bill must be paid. When it pays them by expanding the money supply, the currency is debased. More dollars in circulation do not automatically mean greater wealth. Instead, the value of the currency is inflated. Likewise, heavy government borrowing from the private sector reduces the amount of capital available for business investment and expansion.

These two approaches to financing deficits are responsible for the persistently high interest rates the nation has experienced in recent years. Rates consist of real interest, plus an inflation premium which reflects expectation of further decline in the value of money. Heavy demand for capital by government keeps rates high, making money unaffordable to smaller companies.

For years, Congress has made little or no attempt to limit spending to revenues. It has been reluctant to do so because of pressure from labor unions, financially troubled cities, the welfare lobby, and other groups favoring free-spending federal programs. This profligate spending has led to an inflationary psychology among our people * * *.

The federal debt exceeded $1 trillion in 1982. This does not include government guaranteed loans and other contingent liabilities that are growing at an alarming rate.

The Council urges the Congress to take the following actions:

1. Reduce federal expenditures to the essential minimum for the functioning of the government as defined in the Constitution.

2. Prohibit any further increase in the debt ceiling, except in time of congressinally-declared war, and the contracting of any further obligations outside this ceiling.

3. Approve an amendment to the Constitution limiting federal expenditures to receipts in time of peace, and limiting taxes to a percent of GNP.

4. Provide for a return at the earliest possible time to a currency convertible to gold or other indexed commodity and the transformation of the present managed currency system,

5. Rescreen all previous appropriations to effect necessary savings.

6. In reaching a balanced budget, do so by spending cuts, not by increased taxation.

Wage-price controls

The Council rejects all suggestions of controls on wages, prices, rents, and dividends. Such controls would deal only with the symptoms of our economics ills, not the root causes.

Whenever they have been tried over the centuries, controls have proved to be a failure. They result in black markets and in misallocations of resources. Moreover, wage and price controls inevitably require rationing, which has been a failure when tried and which is unacceptable to the American people. Rationing also requires an army of enforcement agents and costs immense sums. It makes no sense to prevent the normal operations of the marketplace and to continue to allow the government to print money. Controls of the money supply invariably are rejected by proponents of economic controls. They would tie down everyone but the bureaucrats.

Government regulation of business

American industry and business have evolved over the years in response to the changing needs and desires of the consuming public. The USIC favors fair and effective enforcement of the antitrust laws, but rejects the yardstick of mere size as a criterion of monopoly, undue concentration, or lack of competition.

In addition, the USIC is opposed to the federal licensing of corporations as a condition of engaging in interstate and foreign commerce as an unwarranted extension of federal power.

The Council is also opposed to any form of favoritism in the awarding of government contracts. At the present time it is not uncommon for a corporation to be denied a contract simply because it is non-union, or is located in the wrong congressional district, or refuses to conform its business to the satisfaction of bureaucratic planners, or because of its size. It is the opinion of the USIC that the sole criterion for the awarding of government contracts should be the question "Which firm offers the American taxpayers the best product or service at a reasonable price?" Among other examples, the Council is opposed to favoritism in awarding contracts to cooperatives that enjoy special tax advantages.

Finally, the Council takes this opportunity to strongly condemn what it regards as the harassment of private businessmen by government bureaucrats. Owing to a variety of circumstances—chief of which are the proliferation of government agencies and the sharp rise of legal costs—it is now possible for nonelected bureaucrats to intimidate businessmen into complying with their guidelines simply because it is no longer practical for businessmen to litigate every challenge to their constitutional rights. Such harassment is especially burdensome to the small businessman, and is a factor in small business failures—thus undermining free competition. Furthermore, this situation heralds an era of potential bureaucratic dictatorship, and imperils the rights of all Americans. The Council urges that the arbitrary power enjoyed by so many federal bureaucrats be curbed so as to prevent this development.

Toward this same end, the USIC urgently recommends that the rising tide of government forms be stemmed. Such paperwork—much of it either useless or an invasion of corporate privacy—is time-consuming, expensive and ultimately detrimental to the consumer, inasmuch as in the last analysis it is he who must pay for the government's "fishing expeditions."

Bankruptcy

The USIC believes that current bankruptcy law allows debtors to defraud creditors, and in many cases to avoid payment of just debts that they have the ability to pay from current or future earnings. The USIC urges that the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 be amended in order to prevent such abuses.

Alternative economics

The threat of nationalization of U.S. industries is not an immediate one, though there is frequent advocacy of this approach in liberal and radical economic and polemical literature. A more immediate threat is a blurring of the lines between the public and private sector and efforts to institute so-called worker control in failing industries. It is to the advantage of the American people and essential to the survival of free enterprise in the United States there continue to be a sharp distinction between the private and public sectors. It is equally important that the notion of worker control of industries, as is being advanced for failing steel mills, be understood as a form of subsidization. All such schemes depend on massive public assistance in one form or another. Without skilled management such as is to be found in the private sector there is no possibility of such enterprises succeeding—only the likelihood of increased subsidization by the taxpayers. The so-called "Alternative Economic System" now being pushed by radical groups is simply socialism under a more acceptable name.

Advocates of the market economy have long recognized the fact that government can never match the efficiency and resourcefulness of private enterprise. Accordingly, the USIC believes that it is only common sense for the government to open the way for free market solutions to our pressing national problems.

Essential first steps toward this objective including the following:

1. An end to unwarranted government interference in private enterprise.

2. The gradual elimination of all federal subsidies, except those essential for national defense.

3. A return to genuine competition, the law of supply and demand, and other basic free market principles.

4. An increased effort by government at all levels to contract out as much work as possible to the private sector, to improve the quality of government work.

Specifically, the Council urges the development of free market alternatives to the present U.S. Postal Corporation. A good beginning would be the elimination of the government monopoly on the delivery of first class mail.

One of the nostrums now being advanced is a new Reconstruction Finance Corporation that be politically independent, capitalized with $5 billion from the Treasury and authorized to raise $25 billion more through the issuance of federally guaranteed bonds. It would be a bailout mechanism for floundering cities and sick industries. Such an institution would be virtually beyond public control and be able to deflect investment from needed venture capital projects.

Consumerism and the market

The USIC, representing a broad range of industrial, commercial, and general business activities, is deeply concerned about the needs of consumers. Indeed, all sectors of American business share that concern. If business weren't interested in the wants of consumers, business would fail.

The advocates of "consumer" legislation deliberately ignore this fundamental truth. They dismiss efforts of industry to provide high quality goods and services and to police fly-by-night operators. Rather, the advocates of consumer legislation seem more determined to destroy business than to encourage quality goods and services. Indeed, many of their proposals have had the effect of raising prices to consumers.

Some consumer advocates admit that regulation has often backfired on the consumer, but they seem to think that additional regulation will somehow solve the problem. What is really needed, of course, is a return to free market principles.

Nowhere in the world outside the United States do consumers find such a wide range of competitive products. This competitive situation is one of the factors contributing to the excellence of American-made goods and services. It is time, therefore, that the business community go on the offensive in upholding the value of their products and in exposing unfair critics.

Product liability

Each year American business must meet the exorbitant cost of insurance premiums for product liability coverage. The reason for this is the substitution by a substantial majority of American jurisdictions of "strict tort liability" for liability predicated on negligence.

Recommendations:

The USIC opposes any state or federal product liability law that does not include the following features:

(1) The provision to allow sellers to reassert the traditional defense of contributory negligence in all product liability cases; (2) Alternatively, the adoption of comparative negligence standards for plaintiffs who sue on strict liability. Such standards compare the fault of the plaintiff with that of the defendant and apportion damages by reference to a statutory formula; (3) Prohibition against the use of contingent fees in all product liability actions on compensation with awards given only for actual physical injury; (5) The adoption of a 6 year statute of limitations on product liability with some reasonable accommodation made for latent defects, and an unqualified 2 year statute of limitations on product liability actions; and (6) Provision for businesses to accrue annually up to 3% of annual sales in pretax dollars for purposes of a product liability reserve fund up to a total of 15% of average annual sales. (7) In all product liability actions, the plaintiff must show that the product was manufactured by the defendant, a requirement that would specifically overrule the onerous concept of market share liability. We oppose any provisions that encourage the establishment of additional federal standards.

Antitrust for cooperatives

The Council believes that the same antitrust laws that apply to corporations should also apply to cooperatives. Cooperatives should be taxes on the same basis as corporations.

Foreign trade and investments

America favors fair trade and regards the following conditions as prerequisites for truly free trade: unrestricted movement of capital investment, convertibility of currencies at freely floating rates, parallel fiscal and monetary policies, and safeguards against exploitation by foreign tax structures or government-backed monopolies or cartels. These conditions do not exist at this time.

Indeed, the United States faces increasing trade difficulty with countries that have state-directed economies or where major industries are nationalized or where massive export program, aimed at the American market, are guided and controlled by government. These countries seek to dominate the American market while denying U.S. manufacturers an opportunity to compete in their domestic markets. Japan is a prime example.

Accordingly, the USIC urges the Executive Branch to deal firmly with foreign governments that favor cartels and other restrictive devices harmful to America's trade. When our economic well-being is threatened by restrictive or discriminatory trade policies of other nations, we should respond with appropriate measures of our own.

We should also remove "most favored nation" status for trade purposes with all Marxist countries and ban sales of any and all strategic products, minerals and technology to these countries, as well as imports except for strategic commodities.

The solution to the problem of the trade deficit is more complex. Primarily, it requires major increases in American productivity and a greater public awareness of the full cost to the nation of vast imports. Massive reductions in the cost of government regulation and increased productivity will also help American business gain flexibility for competition in foreign markets.

USIC endorses legislation which would enhance the ability of American manufacturers to tap the vast export market for U.S.-made goods. USIC supports legislation that would encourage American exports by facilitating the formation and operation of export trading companies and export trade associations.

V. RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

We propose the maximum development of needed resources while keeping any adverse environmental impact to an acceptable level. Wise use of our resources should include reasonable conservation measures, and exploration and development of natural resources on our public land areas. The USIC strongly supports the proposition that the United States does have the ability to achieve energy independence.

An energy policy

The USIC is confident that the private sector can meet this country's energy needs, and urges a free market solution to our current energy problems. The lifting of price controls on crude oil on January 28, 1981, was a salutary first step in this direction. In like manner, remaining controls on natural gas prices and on the use of gas should be removed. The law of supply and demand, not the rule of government, should determine the price of energy, and the design of autos and other energy-related products. Corporate fuel economy requirements should be abolished, and the free market should guide its design.

To this end, the federal Department of Energy should be abolished. The Department is a chaotic bureaucracy that absorbs billions of tax dollars and has interfered with, rather than contributed to, the production and distribution of energy in the U.S.

The USIC is adamantly opposed to the concept of the so-called "windfall profits" tax on oil. Consequently, we urge its repeal. This is a false name for a heavy excise tax that is levied on the production of oil at the wellhead, not on profits. The $227 billion that the tax is supposed to provide for research and production of "alternative" energy sources will go directly into the federal Treasury, instead of productive capital investment. The ultimate losers will be consumers who must pay the increased costs of production and distribution of gasoline and heating oil, as producers lost the incentive to explore new sources. At the same time the USIC supports further research and development of renewable sources of energy within a free enterprise context. Regardless of merits of the 55 MPH speed limit, serious constitutional questions arise and federal usurpation of states' rights.

If we are to reduce our dependence on foreign oil to a significant degree, we must renew our faith in nuclear energy. It is vital that the American utilities be permitted to contract for and construct nuclear power plants without the endless bureaucratic and environmental harassment that has extended the construction time for a nuclear plant to about 12 years. Where proper precautions are observed, nuclear power is our safest source of energy.

In this regard, Congress and NRC should act promptly to expedite the transportation, off-site storage, and reprocessing of spent nuclear fuels.

The USIC also believes that nuclear power plants should be constructed and operated by investor-owned utilities, whose operating knowhow and dollar investments should be protected against claims from government-subsidized entities. Antitrust review of nuclear projects should be separated from the licensing process to prevent "blackmail" of private enterprise by public power.

Vast United States coal deposits must be utilized to the maximum extent commensurate with healthful air quality, and research and development in coal gasification and liquefication must be encouraged. Congress should amend the Clean Air Act and the Clean Water Act to carefully define their requirements and to allow the states, once they have met these minimum federal standards, to adopt whatever mix of emission and effluent limitation they deem appropriate for their particular circumstances.

Surface mining for coal should be permitted to the maximum degree compatible with reasonable reclamation practices. Coal is the relatively untapped energy source on which our nation must rely if we are to be assured that our energy sources will be adequate to our needs.

Contrary to popular misconception, we are not running out of energy. We are merely exhausting those reserves that are most easily utilized. Developing new reserves will be expensive, so there is no way that higher prices for energy can be avoided. The only question is whether we will have abundant energy at reasonable prices under a free market, or limited supplies at high prices under government controls.

Minerals and mining

In 1950, the United States obtained half or more of its needs of 4 of the 13 basic industrial minerals from overseas. Today, we are dependent on foreign sources for more than half of 20 strategic minerals.

It is obvious that this country could easily be at the mercy of unstable governments in the developing world for supplies of vital minerals, including chrome, platinum, nickel, manganese, cobalt and zinc. These are indispensable to our basic heavy industries, and our defense industries in particular.

The United States has abundant supplies of many important minerals, but restrictive mining and land use laws have hamstrung production of them for years. Through the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 public or government-owned land is available to individuals for mining purposes. But increasing withdrawal of public land from resource development in the name of protecting the environment has drastically cut back tracts available for mining. OSHA, EPA, and wilderness regulations have contributed to the shutdown and lack of development of many mining facilities. The USIC applauds efforts to reverse this trend.

The USIC believes that our increasing dependence on foreign mineral sources leaves the nation vulnerable to sudden cutoffs or embargoes by unfriendly governments. Since our growing dependence on offshore sources of minerals is due to restrictive regulation and land and sea use policies, these should be drastically revised in favor of rapid development of America's mineral resources, and stockpiling of certain strategic minerals.

Furthermore, the Council opposes the concept of seabed minerals as a "common heritage of mankind" as expressed in the proposed Law of the Sea treaty. Private enterprise should not be obligated by an international authority dominated by landlocked nations to turn over the fruits of their substantial investments in seabed mining to countries that make no investment and take no risks in extracting minerals from the oceans beyond national boundaries.

Land use controls

Controls over land use are being sought by local and state agencies as well as at the federal level. These controls unconstitutionally restrict the right of citizens to determine the use of their property. Certainly every effort should be made to resist the socialist idea that property is owned as private property only to the extent that society doesn't need it.

The USIC also supports efforts by individuals and businesses to control a greater share of the vast acreages owned by the federal government. Traditionally, the government sold land to private individuals and companies. The Council supports the reduction of arbitrary federal control over government land by requiring the government to make available for sale selected tracts of federal land that have been inaccessible to private concerns.

Pollution control

The USIC favors reasonable and equitable laws to promote clean air, clean water, and general environmental enhancement. It takes note of the very substantial efforts of American free enterprise companies to control pollution and to develop anti-pollution devices and programs. Industry should be protected against unreasonable and irregularly applied standards, and public authorities should be urged to stand firm against scare tactics and emotionalism with regard to pollution.

Federal pollution controls should be limited to those which directly affect the health of people, and are in keeping with the constitution. The public has not been adequately informed of the vast scope of anti-pollution efforts by industry. The steel, electric power, paper, chemical and petroleum industries, to cite only a few, have devoted colossal sums to the abatement of pollution.

Pollution abatement also has to be considered in balance with other national needs and problems. The automobile industry, for example, shouldn't be required to accept emission control regulations which are in advance of the state of technology or which make motor vehicles prohibitively expensive to operate. The requirements of personal transportation have to be recognized in a large country with decentralized city populations.

Furthermore, the public must be made to realize that unreasonable pollution controls demanded by government stand to cost them untold billions of dollars in the form of higher prices and increased fuel consumption.

Water resources

The nation is just beginning to realize that full development of natural resources in the West requires massive amount of water. Efficient management of existing water supplies is not the answer to present and future needs. Emphasis must be placed on gaining access to new water resources for the arid regions of the country. To this end, the United States Industrial Council favors studies and negotiations aimed at persuading Canada, which owns from one-quarter to one-third of the world's supply of fresh surface water, to make available its surplus water on a market basis to the arid parts of the United States.

VI. EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MANAGEMENT AND LABOR

The rights of the individual worker and the general welfare of the people should take precedence over the special privileges enjoyed by organized labor.

Union coercion

Much of the corruption and arrogance that characterizes the labor movement today stems from the unique privileges of coercion that unions enjoy under federal law. In states without right-to-work laws, a worker may be forced to join or to pay dues to a union in order to hold a job. In all states, individual workers may be forced to accept a union as their bargaining agent against their will.

The USIC believes that union membership should be strictly voluntary, and that unions should be empowered to bargain only for their own members. The Council favors reform of our national labor laws to achieve these ends.

To further protect workers and the public from union coercion, the USIC proposes the following additional reforms:

1. The enactment of legislation which would remove exemptions of labor unions from prosecution for criminal activity:

2. That strikes be made subject to control of the bargaining unit by secret ballot of membership after consideration of the employer's last negotiated best offer;

3. That existing restrictions against secondary boycotts be retained and strengthened;

4. That compulsory check-off of union dues be prohibited; whenever check-off of any nature is allowed, that the employee be permitted to terminate the check-off agreement on exactly the same basis that was used in agreeing to the check-off;

5. That all bargaining agents be required to recertify every five years;

6. That all union elections be held by secret ballot.

Antitrust for unions

The USIC calls on Congress to place unions under the antitrust laws. The exercise of monopoly power by labor unions is one of the basic problems of our society. Monopolistic union power drives up the cost of goods and services. The public interest requires that unions be prohibited from taking actions which will unreasonably restrain trade and commerce.

A number of national legislators are seeking passage of bills that would place labor unions under the antitrust laws. Such legislation is long overdue. No reason exists why labor unions should be exempt from antitrust laws which apply to business enterprises. A labor monopoly is clearly detrimental to the public interest.

National Labor Relations Board

Over the years, the National Labor Relations Board has played a key role in denying justice to employers and non-unionized employees. Where the issue has been union advantage or the public welfare, the NLRB almost uniformly decided in favor of the union.

The USIC believes that the concept of administrative justice on which the Board is based, in addition to the built-in bias toward union organizations, renders the NLRB a basically unfair and improper instrument in labor disputes. The Council subscribes to the principal that controversies regarding labor-management relations should be removed from the NLRB's jurisdiction and turned over to the federal courts.

Strikes against private employers

The use of physical force, threats, violence and mass picketing interferes with the employee's freedom of choice and should not be permitted. Conscientious and fearless enforcement of the law at state and local levels would largely eliminate these evils. In many instances, public officials, charged under their oath of office with law enforcement, have been grossly derelict in their duties.

The USIC urges enactment of legislation to prevent public subsidization of strikers. It is intolerable that subsidies have been given in the form of food stamps, welfare payments, and unemployment compensation. Strikers have jobs; they simply refuse to perform them. In no way, therefore are they deserving of public charity or assistance. Moreover, the subsidization of strikers hits the public twice, in taxes to pay for the benefits, and higher prices caused by excessive wage demands enforced by strikers.

The USIC also believes that the existing Taft-Hartley prohibition against secondary boycotts at construction sites should be retained.

Wages and productivity

Productivity, the amount that a worker produces per hour, is a prime indicator of the nation's economic strength. Increased productivity is the only valid source of higher earnings and an improved standard of living.

In times past, American worker productivity was unparalleled. This was a major factor in America's economic success. But increases in worker productivity in the United States have lagged far behind other industrial nations in recent years. Unless Americans greatly increase their productivity, the U.S. will cease to be the leading industrial nation before the end of this century.

Wage increases by government fiat as a substitute for wage increases which reflect higher productivity can only aggravate our present economic problems. The inability of U.S. business and industry to compete in world markets is due to the wage and productivity gap between American labor and that of foreign competitors.

Accordingly, the USIC opposes any increase in the minimum wage. Minimum wage laws not only fuel the rise in costs and prices, but have the effect of eliminating thousands of jobs for the people who need them most—the young, the poor, and the unskilled.

One of the encouraging signs in the past year has been the surfacing of the novel concept of the "giveback" which brings wage agreements more in line with economic realities. Another happy change is in the direction of union concessions on working conditions, which are essential if American industry is to regain its competitive position in domestic and world markets. This has been a recession phenomenon but must be made to realize that the survival of U.S. industry depends on modernization of work rules.

In addition, the Council opposes the concept of "work preservation" clauses as an exchange for union concessions on wages and benefits.

Also, the Council favors the repeal of the Walsh-Healy and Davis-Bacon Acts (which regulate the wages paid on government procurement and construction contracts). These laws are prime examples of government wage distortions for political purposes. If these laws are not repealed, they should at least be enforced so as to reflect the local prevailing wages.

Employee health, safety and benefits

American business has a history of concern for employee health and safety. The vast majority of companies have rules requiring health and safety procedures. The states also have laws regulating such matters.

Nevertheless, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration remains in existence, despite its lack of success in reducing accidents.

OSHA fails to place any responsibility on the individual worker for using health and safety equipment provided by the employer. It fails to recognize the major role that worker carelessness plays in causing industrial accidents. It has eaten up new investments that should have gone to create jobs, and has raised prices for the consumer. At the same time it has provided federal bureaucrats, union leaders, and disgruntled employees with another weapon to use against management.

The USIC therefore advocates that the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 be repealed, and that the talks of ensuring worker safety be returned to the states and private safety promotion groups.

It is also essential that the federal bureaucracy's excesses in the enforcement of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969 (which have contributed to reductions of up to 50% and more in productivity of underground coal mines—with resulting increases in coal cost) be curbed so as to reduce the massive overkill and harassment now being applied. This act, incidently, has been no more successful than OSHA in reducing accidents.

The provisions of Title IV of the act should be repealed or be amended so as to rescue the coal mining companies from the enormous and overwhelming potential liability of the socialized subsidy to coal miners by way of so-called black lung benefits.

The states should have maximum latitude in the solution of unemployment problems peculiar to their localities. The USIC strongly opposes any federalization of the unemployment program, or workmen's compensation program, including federal payment of benefits or the imposition of federal standards for the payment thereof.

The Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA) has in many ways worked against the interests of the workers it was designed to protect. Nearly every provision—vesting and funding requirements, termination insurance, rules regarding fiduciary responsibility—has tended to increase the cost of providing pension benefits. The paperwork burdens alone are unduly burdensome to small business. Indeed, thousands of companies have terminated their pension plans since ERISA has gone into effect. Because of its counterproductive results, the USIC recommends that the act be repealed.

The bulk of this country's private pension funds are financed entirely by employers. These funds are a major source of capital for our economy. It is therefore in the interest of both labor and management that they be profitably invested.

Unfortunately, union trustees of these funds are now being urged to use them as social weapons. In other words, to base investment decisions on noneconomic criteria such as whether or not a potential borrower is friendly to organized labor. The Council urges that the fiduciary obligations of pension fund trustees be tightened to prevent such abuses.

Public employees

The USIC strongly opposes unionization of public employees and urges the states to forbid strikes by these employees. Widespread employee strikes have revealed the threat these work stoppages represent to the normal functioning of American cities and communities. The public has a right to expect that fire, police, sanitation and hospital services as well as school and mail services will not be interrupted by any group at any time. If public employee strikes gain acceptance, entire communities will be subject to economic blackmail and be endangered by crime, fire, or epidemic.

Unionization of public employees, with resulting control over the availability of essential public services, is the chief current objective of the labor movement. The monopoly position of the unions already represents a serious threat to the well-being of the country, and any extension of that monopoly power into the area of public services would be a social disaster for many communities.

VII. REFORM OF CURRENT SOCIAL POLICIES

The USIC favors free market solutions to the problems of education and welfare.

Public and private education

The USIC has long argued that Congress should reduce federal aid to education as education, traditionally, has been an activity of state and local government. One by-product of more difficult economic times is that such aid has been reduced. The government also has tightened up on federal loans to students, many of which loans had not been repaid. All this is to the good.

It is important, as part of the new federalism, that the states continue to assume a larger responsibility for higher education, and that the private sector do its part in carrying the educational burdens.

Important new initiatives are under way in the private sector, with corporations joining in new consortia in order to finance the advanced research that is necessary for the modernization of American business and industry. The USIC believes that such consortia represented a desirable alternative to federal aid and believe they should be encouraged. It is very important, however, that a place be made for the participation of small business so that it will share in the results of new research.

The USIC calls on the federal government to maintain the tax exemption of independent schools. Efforts to eliminate such exemptions would damage the quality of education in the country.

Lastly, the Council endorses the action taken by several states in requiring that the fundamentals of the free enterprise system be taught in the public schools. Considering the lack of public understanding of the true nature and operation of the market economy, the Council feels it would be well if all states were to adopt such a policy.

Numerous private companies and organizations have done much to show how free enterprise protects the rights and enhances the prosperity of individual Americans. The USIC heartily endorses such private education programs as deserving of support and encouragement by private groups and public officials.

Social security

The USIC has long recognized that the Social Security System has been seriously underfunded. Without some corrective action, the Old Age and Survivors Insurance trust fund would have faced bankruptcy in July, 1983. Faced with this immediate crisis of solvency of the system, President Reagan appointed a National Commission on Social Security Reform. The Commission's recommendations of January 15, 1983 included: including under Social Security coverage all non-profit and new government employees; requiring Social Security recipients with incomes in excess of $20,000.00 to pay income taxes on benefits; shifting the automatic benefits increase to a calendar year basis, rescheduling tax payroll tax increases set for 1985 and 1989 for 1984 and 1988 respectively, and other measures.

Fundamentally, the insurance program Social Security was originally intended to be has been expanded into a partial welfare program. In 1982, Social Security benefit payments totaled $154.1 billion. Originally, the Reagan budget projections forecast Social Security outlays to increase by about $125 billion per year through 1984–1988. The Commission's recommendations would reduce that annual increase to roughly $10 billion.

The USIC concurs that the Social Security system must be drastically reformed. However, the Commission's recommendations rely primarily on increased taxes to bail out the system. As much as 75 percent of the proposed deficit reduction in the program comes from higher taxes.

Instead the USIC recommends that the program's welfare and insurance functions be recognized and separated accordingly; also that:

1. Benefit formulas be revised to ensure that individuals receive benefits that are directly related to contributions;

2. The current CPI escalator clause which is used to determine cost-of-living increases be eliminated;

3. The present system of equal contributions by employers and employees be retained;

4. No portion of Social Security should be funded from general revenues—this would camouflage the true nature of the program, increase the federal deficit, and fuel inflation.

5. Employees should be given the opportunity to take advantage of opportunities to invest their Social Security payment in private Individual Retirement Accounts (IRAs). Keough plans and other private plans.

Welfare

Federal spending now tops half a trillion dollars a year, much of it for welfare programs. For example, the food stamp program is expected to cost $10.9 billion with more than 21 million recipients of the handouts. Altogether, the welfare and assistance and other entitlements will cost nearly $365 billion a year.

The USIC believes that these programs must be cut back enormously if the productive sectors of the population are to survive. Too few are being asked to do too much.

The root of the problem lies with the so-called "entitlement" programs—so-called because their recipients are legally "entitled" to benefits. The recipients can force the government, under threat of court action, to provide benefits.

Congress can and must change the basic laws that create these entitlements. Welfare outlays aren't uncontrollable, if there is a will to dismantle welfare state legislation.

Congress also can amend the basic laws to set work requirements for welfare recipients. It can give states bloc grants for welfare instead of ruling how they must spend such funds.

This is the type of basic reform that must be achieved if the welfare system is to be brought under control. USIC believes that decisions being made today will determine whether we are to become a socialist nation or remain free.

Health care legislation

The USIC is opposed to nationalized health care services. Such services have proven enormously expensive and destructive of quality medical care. The Council believes that the maintenance of high quality medicine, in which the United States leads the world, is the result of the private delivery system for medical services. Wherever possible, the organization, delivery and financing of medical care should be done on a private basis.

The USIC deplores the growing threat to the quality of medical care posed by increased federal involvement in operations of hospitals and the medical profession. When politics enters the hospital, good medical practice is endangered. It is imperative, therefore, that ways be found to retain professional control of hospital practices. Toward this end, the Council recommends voluntary efforts to control hospital costs—as opposed to federal controls—and urges the abolition of the Professional Services Review Organization.

Urban dole

The decline of many large central cities, as a result of profligate public spending, rent control, massive unionization and inadequate anti-crime action, has produced a demand for a large-scale bailout by the nation's taxpayers. The USIC believes that the public should firmly reject an "urban strategy" that is based on federal credit guarantees to cities, federally-financed housing, federal employment programs in inner city areas, special privileges for minority-operated businesses, tax cuts for businessmen that operate in depressed areas, so-called "development banks" which would channel taxpayers' funds to municipal projects that represent questionable investments, or other types of public dole activity.

One example of this misuse of taxpayer dollars is the Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG), which is a means to provide private interests with easy money for urban projects. Hotels, condominiums, auditoriums, and marinas have been built with federal funds through UDAGs, financed by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. These grants are a form of corporate welfare, and should be eliminated.

Deteriorating cities can't be rescued by taxpayer subsidies. Furthermore, such subsidies are unfair to progressive municipalities that operate on a responsible basis and that are free of graft and bureaucratic waste. The only way for a city to regain its fiscal health is to eliminate costly services, restore law and order, and institute effective fiscal controls creating an atmosphere favorable to private investment.

Beyond this, Congress should reject the idea that the federal government ought to be the employer of first resort or the provider of housing.

VIII. BUSINESS AND INDUSTRY NEEDS

As the United States leaves the recession behind it is important that the country pursue the goal of a truly dynamic economy that will give the American people the high standard of living they want and expect. In order to do this, new efforts must be made to enhance the entrepreneurial system and make its needs better known.

For some years, the United States has been the victim of a process of deindustrialization. This started with an environmental movement that lost sight of the need for access to natural resources by a vibrant business and industrial system. Unfortunately, the mistaken notions of excessive environmentalism continue to inhibit the maximization of business opportunities. With the retarding of the nation's industries, other, more competitive countries, with a better business climate, have gained an advantage. One major victim of the deindustrialization mood has been the virtual halting of the nuclear energy industry so important to America's energy future. Anti-nuclear and anti-business activists are even more active today than they were five or ten years ago. The no-growth lobby bears a heavy responsibility for the economic decline of the past few years.

Full renewal of the American economy will require a change of public attitudes towards business and industry. A new positive attitude is necessary. It also is important that Americans understand that there are profound structural changes afoot in American business and industry and that it would be a disaster to try to freeze employment in the patterns of yesteryear. The country needs to understand the problems of all types and sizes of business and not regard any as expendable. Special attention, however, should be placed on the importance of venture capital projects and industries which use high technology and advanced manufacturing processes. The United States cannot afford to lag behind any nation in the development of computer-related industries. And these industries, like low tech industries, depend, in the final analysis, on a good business climate that is free of unwarranted regulation and oppressive taxation.●

SURPLUS COMMODITIES FOR THE ELDERLY

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I introduced on September 21, 1983, a bill which would raise the fiscal 1984 authorization level for the U.S. Department of Agriculture's food donation program for the elderly, authorized under section 311 of the Older Americans Act, from $105 million to $121.916 million, and which would require the States to submit vouchers to the USDA in a timely manner.

SECTION 311 OF THE OLDER AMERICANS ACT

Title III of the Older Americans Act of 1965 (Public Law 89-73, as amended) creates in the 50 States and the territories a nutrition program for older Americans. This program is probably the most popular of those authorized by the Older Americans Act. It has been strongly supported by the Congress since its inception in 1973. The program provides both congregate and home-delivered meals. The authorized funding level for the congregate part of the program for fiscal 1984 is $365,300,000. The authorized level for the home-delivered part of the program for fiscal 1984 is $68,700,000. A separate section of the act, section 311, allows States to receive from the U.S. Department of Agriculture surplus commodities and products purchased by the Secretary of Agriculture, or to receive cash from the Department in lieu of commodities. These commodities, or cash in lieu thereof, are used to provide additional meals for older Americans through the congregate and home-delivered meals programs.

At the outset of the program, States were able to receive from the Department only surplus commodities. Difficulties of various kinds in managing these commodities led to widespread interest in receiving cash in place of commodities, and, in 1975, the law was amended to permit States to take cash instead of surplus commodities.

Section 311 authorizes funds in addition to those authorized for congregate and home-delivered meals and stipulates that these funds be used by the Department of Agriculture to provide the States a given amount of money, or its equivalent in surplus commodities, for each congregate and home-delivered meal that they serve. The amount provided for each meal was to increase each year from 30 cents in 1978 by an amount equivalent to the annual percentage increase in the series for food away from home of the Consumer Price Index published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. The amount which the Department will provide for each meal in fiscal 1984 is presently estimated to be $0.565. Section 311(d)(1) authorized for this surplus commodities program $93,200,000 for fiscal year 1982, $100 million for fiscal year 1983, and $105 million for fiscal year 1984. Section 311(d)(2) then stipulates that, in the event that the sums needed by the States exceeded authorized levels, the Secretary of Agriculture could reduce the cents per meal made available for that fiscal year so that program expenditures would remain within authorized levels.

FISCAL 1982, 1983, AND 1984 SHORTFALLS FOR THE PROGRAM

The amount of money the States requested exceeded the authorized appropriation for fiscal years 1982 and 1983, and it is anticipated that the amounts they request will exceed the authorized amount for fiscal year 1984.

There are at least three reasons for the shortfall: First, inflation; second, program efficiencies; and third, non-Federal contributions to the program. Program efficiencies permit States to serve more meals for the same amount of money. There are two primary sources of non-Federal contributions. Some State governments make money available for the program. In addition, the administration has commenced a contributions campaign, urging States to encourage program participants to make contributions to the program. Around $90 million was raised through voluntary contributions in fiscal 1982 and around $120 million will be raised in fiscal 1983. These moneys are ordinarily used to provide additional meals.

Because the General Counsels of the Departments of Agriculture and Health and Human Services and the Administration for Public Services agreed in 1980 that all meals served by a State nutrition program, regardless of the sources from which funds for those meals came, would be reimbursed at the stipulated rate, State allocations to the program, participant contributions and program efficiencies increase the total amount by which the Department must compensate the States.

The amount requested for fiscal year 1982 exceeded the authorized amount by $6.8 million. The Department of Agriculture reprogramed this amount from elsewhere in its budget for use by the surplus commodities program. The shortfall for fiscal 1983 was $16 million. A shortfall is anticipated for 1984.

To deal with the 1983 and 1984 shortfalls, Representative MARIO BIAGGI introduced H.R. 2807 which proposed to raise the authorized amounts for fiscal 1983 to $116 million and to "such sums as shall be needed" for fiscal 1984. This bill was passed by the House, introduced in the Senate and referred to the Subcommittee on Aging of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources. The supplemental appropriations bill for 1983 provided an additional $16 million for the program and, in addition, required that vouchers from the States be submitted in a timely manner. This latter provision was necessary because tardy claims are common in this program. The Department was processing 1981 claims as late as January 1983. There are now outstanding claims from 1979 from eight States in the amount of $875,000.

THE GRASSLEY BILL

My bill would raise the authorization ceiling for this program from $105 million for fiscal 1984 to $121.916 million, and would require States to submit vouchers to the USDA within 90 days of the last day of the month in which a meal is served. This amount for fiscal 1984 represents the amount to which the fiscal 1983 appropriation was raised by the supplemental appropriations bill for 1983, $116 million, plus 5.1 percent for the anticipated inflation in the food away from home series of the Consumer Price Index. It is my feeling that the time to take up whether "such sums as shall be needed" should be authorized is during the reauthorization of the act in 1984. The need for a timely submissions requirement is clear.

THE APPROPRIATIONS PROCESS

Appropriations for 1984 could eliminate any urgent need for this bill. However, without going into the complexities of the appropriations process at this time, there may well be a need for an increase in the authorization level for the program later in the fiscal year. Furthermore, the requirement for timely submission of vouchers is legislation which properly belongs in authorization rather than appropriations bills. Because I want to be sure that appropriate funds can be made available for this vital program, I have introduced this bill.●

EXTENSION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have checked with the staff of the minority leader, and they have indicated to me that there is no further requirement for him to be present or further requests. If no other Senator is now seeking recognition—and I see none—I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. I thank the majority leader. I should like to take a few minutes in the morning hour to deliver my statement on El Salvador.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until 5:15 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LAND REFORM IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, land reform is once again in danger of being undermined in El Salvador. The Constituent Assembly in that country will vote in the near future on three articles in the draft constitution, which—if passed—could halt the agrarian reform in its tracks.

Two major consequences would result if the constitutional provisions dealing with agrarian reform are adopted with their present interpretation. First, the "land to the tiller" program would be terminated at the end of this year because after December 31 potential beneficiaries would no longer be eligible to apply for title. Fewer than 40 percent of the eligible beneficiaries have so far applied for title under the land to the tiller program, which enables peasants to purchase the plot that they have rented over a period of years. Thus, even if the number of applicants greatly increases in the next few months, many families could be excluded from promised benefits.

Second, the preservation of the peasant cooperatives established under phase I of the agrarian reform could be threatened. Under phase I, the ownership of some 300 large estates was transferred to cooperative farms run by 32,000 peasant families. But the new constitution, by encouraging individual cooperative members to sell off portions of this communal property, could bring about the unraveling of the cooperative enterprises.

Beyond these specific ramifications, approval by the assembly of these newly proposed provisions could demonstrate that the Government was abandoning the original goals of the land reform legislation. Such action therefore could spark a concerted effort across the board to roll back the agrarian reform.

Rolling back land reform in El Salvador is not in the interest of the United States. It would simply strengthen the hand of the guerrillas fighting against the Government. It would make U.S. efforts at negotiations more difficult. It would weaken support for the Salvadoran Government in the United States.

An alternative proposal that would maintain the integrity of the agrarian reform process is being offered by a coalition of labor and peasant organizations, together with the Christian Democratic Party. I am particularly alarmed by indications that death squads in El Salvador are using terrorist tactics to try to discourage this coalition from mobilizing public support for their initiatives. Indeed, the recent increase in terrorism by extremists on both sides of the conflict in El Salvador further weakens the political fabric of that country and must be condemned by us all.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has held up aid to the Salvadoran Government in the past when it appeared that the agrarian reform was under attack. It is probable that such action would be taken again if need be to keep this crucial land reform program on track.

This land reform program constituted a vital condition for continued U.S. military and economic support to El Salvador and has been reiterated as a goal and objective by provisional President Alvaro Magana, as well as by his predecessor Jose Napoleon Duarte. In addition, support for agrarian reform has been an important part of the political platform of a majority of Salvadoran political parties and elected members of the assembly. A reversal in course now would only strengthen the guerrillas and undercut the credibility of the political parties and public officials that constitute the Government of El Salvador. It would also jeopardize U.S. assistance and support.

PRESIDENT'S U.N. SPEECH

Mr. PERCY. Many in the United States criticize the United Nations and question U.S. membership and contributions to the U.N. family of organizations. It is clear that the United Nations could be a more effective organization but it is my belief that it plays an important role in preserving and promoting international peace and security, international development and human rights. To date no one has been able to identify a better way to approach these problems on a world scale.

Every administration since the founding of the United Nations has determined that U.S. membership is in our direct interests and that we should play an active role in U.N. organizations as part of our overall program of diplomacy. Thoughtful Members of Congress consistently agree.

It follows that the United States should provide its share of the resources necessary for the operation of the United Nations. The U.S. contribution is consistent with the U.N. Charter and is a legal, treaty obligation. President Reagan made his position clear when he visited the United Nations last year and stated:

> However imperfect the reality may be . . . I should point out that even in a time of domestic retrenchment, American financial support (for the U.N.) has not and will not decline.

At the direct instruction of the President, the current administration has made a concerted effort to restrain growth in U.N. budgets—and we are beginning to see results across the spectrum of U.N. agencies.

Recent events, including the KAL tragedy make it a particularly unfortunate time to suggest that the United States should weaken its ties with the United Nations.

In the aftermath of the KAL tragedy, the United States and its allies turned quickly to the U.N. Security Council and the International Civil Aviation Organization to use those U.N. institutions to focus world opinion on this barbaric destruction of the Korean airliner.

President Reagan, believing the world situation requires a statement of American policies, delivered this morning an outstanding U.S. address to the U.N. General Assembly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President's statement be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT TO THE 38TH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Thank you for granting me the honor of speaking today, on this first day of general debate in the 38th Session of the General Assembly. Once again I come before this body preoccupied with peace. Last year I stood in this chamber to address the Special Session on Disarmament. I have come today to renew my Nation's commitment to peace. I have come to discuss how we can keep faith with the dreams that created this organization.

The United Nations was founded in the aftermath of World War II to protect future generations from the scourge of war, to promote political self-determination and global prosperity, and to strengthen the bonds of civility among nations. The founders sought to replace a world at war with a world of civilized order. They hoped that a world of relentless conflict would give way to a new era, one where freedom from violence prevailed.

Whatever challenges the world was bound to face, the founders intended this body to stand for certain values, even if they could not be enforced, and to condemn violence, even if it could not be stopped. This body was to speak with the voice of moral authority. That was to be its greatest power.

But the awful truth is that the use of violence for political gain has become more, not less, widespread in the last decade. Events of recent weeks have presented new, unwelcome evidence of brutal disregard for life and truth. They have offered unwanted testimony on how divided and dangerous our world is, how quick the recourse to violence.

What has happened to the dreams of the U.N.'s founders?

What has happened to the spirit which created the U.N.?

The answer is clear: Governments got in the way of the dreams of the people. Dreams became issues of East versus West. Hopes became political rhetoric. Progress became a search for power and domination. Somewhere the truth was lost that people don't make war, governments do.

And today in Asia, Africa, Latin America, the Middle East, and the North Pacific, the weapons of war shatter the security of the peoples who live there, endanger the peace of neighbors, and create ever more arenas of confrontation between the great powers. During the past year alone, violent conflicts have occurred in the hills around Beirut, the deserts of Chad and the Western Sahara, in the mountains of El Salvador, the streets of Suriname, the cities and countryside of Afghanistan, the borders of Kampuchea, and the battlefields of Iran and Iraq.

We cannot count on the instinct for survival to protect us against war, despite all the wasted lives and hopes that war produces, it has remained a regular, if horribly costly, means by which nations have sought to settle their disputes or advance their goals.

And the progress in weapons technology has far outstripped the progress toward peace. In modern times, a new, more terrifying element has entered into the calculations—nuclear weapons. A nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought. I believe that if governments are determined to deter and prevent war, there will not be war. Nothing is more in keeping with the spirit of the U.N. Charter than arms control.

When I spoke before the Second Special Session on Disarmament, I affirmed the United States Government's commitment, and my personal commitment, to reduce nuclear arms, and to negotiate in good faith toward that end.

Today, I reaffirm those commitments. The United States has already reduced the number of its nuclear weapons worldwide and, while replacement of older weapons is unavoidable, we wish to negotiate arms reductions, and to achieve significant, equitable, verifiable arms control agreements. And let me add, we must ensure that world security is not undermined by the further spread of nuclear weapons. Nuclear non-proliferation must not be the forgotten element of the world's arms control agenda.

At the time of my last visit here, I expressed hope that a whole class of weapons systems—the longer-range INF missiles—could be banned from the face of the earth. I believe that to relieve the deep concern of peoples in both Europe and Asia, the time was ripe, for the first time in history, to resolve a security threat exclusively through arms control. I still believe the elimination of these weapons—the zero option—is the best, fairest, most practical solution to this problem. Unfortunately, the Soviet Union declined to accept the total elimination of this class of weapons.

When I was here last, I hoped that the critical Strategic Arms Reduction Talks would focus, and urgently so, on those systems that carry the greatest risk of nuclear war—the fast-flying, accurate, intercontinental ballistic missiles which pose a first strike potential. I also hoped the negotiations could reduce by one-half the number of strategic missiles on each side and reduce their warheads by one-third. Again, I was disappointed when the Soviets declined to consider such deep cuts, and refused as well to concentrate on these most dangerous destabilizing weapons.

Despite the rebuffs, the United States has not abandoned and will not abandon the search for meaningful arms control agreements. Last June, I proposed a new approach toward the START negotiations. We did not alter our objective of substantial reductions, but we recognized that there are a variety of ways to achieve this end. During the last round of Geneva talks, we presented a draft treaty which responded to a number of concerns raised by the Soviet Union. We will continue to build upon this initiative.

Similarly, in our negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces, when the Soviet leaders adamantly refused to consider the total elimination of these weapons, the United States made a new offer. He proposed, as an interim solution, some equal number on both sides between zero and 572. We recommended the lowest possible level.

Once again, the Soviets refused an equitable solution and proposed instead what might be called a "half zero option"—zero for us, and many hundreds of warheads for them. That is where things stand today, but I still have not given up hope that the Soviet Union will enter into serious negotiations.

We are determined to spare no effort to achieve a sound, equitable and verifiable agreement. For this reason, I have given new instructions to Ambassador Nitze in Geneva, telling him to put forward a package of steps designed to advance the negotiations as rapidly as possible. These initiatives build on the interim framework the United States advanced last March and address concerns that the Soviets have raised at the bargaining table in the past. Specifically:

First, the United States proposes a new initiative on global limits. If the Soviet Union agrees to reductions and limits on a global basis, the United States for its part, will not offset the entire Soviet global missile deployment through U.S. deployments in Europe. We would, of course, retain the right to deploy missiles elsewhere.

Second, the United States is prepared to be more flexible on the content of the current talks. The United States will consider mutually acceptable ways to address the Soviet desire that an agreement should limit aircraft as well as missiles.

Third, the United States will address the mix of missiles that would result from reductions. In the context of reductions to equal levels, we are prepared to reduce the number of Pershing II ballistic missiles as well as ground-launched cruise missiles.

I have decided to put forward these important initiatives after full and extensive consultations with our allies, including personal correspondence I have had with the leaders of the NATO governments and Japan and frequent meetings of the NATO Special Consultative Group. I have also stayed in close touch with other concerned friends and allies. The door to an agreement is open. It is time for the Soviet Union to walk through it.

I want to make an unequivocal pledge to those gathered today in this world arena. The United States seeks and will accept any equitable verifiable agreement that stabilizes forces at lower levels than currently exist. We are ready to be flexible in our approach, indeed, willing to compromise. We cannot, however, especially in light of recent events, compromise on the necessity of effective verification.

Reactions to the Korean airliner tragedy are a timely reminder of just how different the Soviets' concept of truth and international cooperation is from that of the rest of the world. Evidence abounds that we cannot simply assume that agreements negotiated with the Soviet Union will be fulfilled. We negotiated the Helsinki Final Act, but the promised freedoms have not been provided, and those in the Soviet Union who sought to monitor their fulfillment languish in prison. We negotiated a Biological Weapons Convention, but deadly yellow rain and other toxic agents fall on Hmong villages and Afghan encampments. We have negotiated arms agreements, but the high level of Soviet encoding hides the information needed for their verification. A newly-discovered radar facility and a new ICBM raise serious concerns about Soviet compliance with agreements already negotiated.

Peace cannot be served by pseudo arms control. We need reliable, reciprocal reductions. I call upon the Soviet Union today to reduce the tensions it has heaped on the world in the past few weeks, and to show a firm commitment to peace by coming to the bargaining table with a new understanding of its obligations. I urge it to match our flexibility. If the Soviets sit down at the bargaining table seeking genuine arms reductions, there will be arms reductions. The governments of the West and their people will not be diverted by misinformation and threats. The time has come for the Soviet Union to show proof that it wants arms control in reality, not just in rhetoric.

Meaningful arms control agreements between the U.S. and the Soviet Union would make our world less dangerous; so would a number of confidence-building steps we have already proposed to the Soviet Union.

Arms control requires a spirit beyond narrow national interests. This spirit is a basic pillar on which the U.N. was founded. We seek a return to this spirit. A fundamental step would be a true nonalignment of the United Nations. This would signal a return to the true values of the Charter, including the principle of universality. The members of the United Nations must be aligned on the side of justice rather than injustice, peace rather than aggression, human dignity rather than subjugation. Any other alignment is beneath the purpose of this great body and destructive of the harmony it seeks. What harms the Charter harms peace.

The founders of the U.N. expected that member nations would behave and vote as individuals, after they had weighed the merits of an issue—rather like a great, global town meeting. The emergence of blocs and the polarization of the U.N. undermine all that this organization initially valued.

We must remember that the non-aligned movement was founded to counter the development of blocs and to promote détente between them. Its founders spoke of the right of smaller countries not to become involved in others' disagreements. Since then, membership in the non-aligned movement has grown dramatically, but not all the new members have shared the founders' commitment to genuine non-alignment. Indeed, client governments of the Soviet Union, who have long since lost their independence, have flocked into the non-aligned movement, and once inside have worked against its true purpose. Pseudo non-alignment is no better than pseudo arms control.

The United States rejects as false and misleading the view of the world as divided between the empires of the East and West. We reject it on factual grounds. The United States does not head any bloc of subservient nations, nor do we desire to. What is called the West is a free alliance of governments, most of whom are democratic and all of whom greatly value their independence. What is called the East is an empire directed from the center which is Moscow.

The United States, today, as in the past, is a champion of freedom and self-determination for all people. We welcome diversity; we support the right of all nations to define and pursue their national goals. We respect their decisions and their sovereignty, asking only that they respect the decisions and sovereignty of others. Just look at the world over the last 30 years, and then decide for yourself whether the United States or the Soviet Union has pursued an expansionist policy.

Today, the United States contributes to peace by supporting collective efforts by the international community. We give our unwavering support to the peacekeeping efforts of this body, as well as other multilateral peacekeeping efforts around the world. The U.N. has a proud history of promoting conciliation and helping keep the peace. Today, U.N. peacekeeping forces or observers are present in Cyprus and Kashmir, on the Golan Heights and in Lebanon.

In addition to our encouragement of international diplomacy, the United States recognizes its responsibilities to use its own influence for peace. From the days when Theodore Roosevelt mediated the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, we have a long and honorable tradition of mediating or dampening conflicts and promoting peaceful solutions. In Lebanon, we, along with France, Italy and the United Kingdom, have worked for a ceasefire, for the withdrawal of all external forces, and for restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity. In Chad, we have joined others in supporting the recognized government in the face of external aggression. In Central America, as in southern Africa, we are seeking to discourage reliance upon force and to construct a framework for peaceful negotiations. We support a policy to disengage the major powers from Third World conflict.

The U.N. Charter gives an important role to regional organizations in the search for peace. The U.S. efforts in the cause of peace are only one expression of a spirit that also animates others in the world community. The Organization of American States was a pioneer in regional security efforts. In Central America, the members of the Contadora group are striving to lay a foundation for peaceful resolution of that region's problems. In East Asia, the Asian countries have built a framework for peaceful political and economic cooperation that has greatly strengthened the prospects for lasting peace in their region. In Africa, organizations such as the Economic Community of West African States are being forged to provide practical structures in the struggle to realize Africa's potential.

From the beginning, our hope for the United Nations has been that it would reflect the international community at its best. The U.N. at its best can help us transcend fear and violence and can act as an enormous force for peace and prosperity. Working together, we can combat international lawlessness and promote human dignity.

If the governments represented in this chamber want peace as genuinely as their peoples do, we shall find it. We can do so by reasserting the moral authority of the United Nations. In recent weeks, the moral outrage of the world seems to have reawakened.

Out of the billions of people who inhabit this planet, why, some might ask, should the death of several hundred shake the world so profoundly? Why should the death of a mother flying toward a reunion with her family or the death of a scholar heading toward new pursuits of knowledge matter so deeply? Why are nations who lost no citizens in the tragedy so angry?

The reason rests on our assumptions about civilized life and the search for peace. The confidence that allows a mother or a scholar to travel to Asia or Africa or Europe or anywhere else on this planet may be only a small victory in humanity's struggle for peace. Yet what is peace if not the sum of such small victories?

Each stride for peace and every small victory are important for the journey toward a lasting, a larger peace. We have made progress. We have avoided another world war. We have seen an end to the traditional colonial era and the birth of 100 newly-sovereign nations. Even though development remains a formidable challenge, we have witnessed remarkable economic growth among industrialized and developing nations. The U.N. and its affiliates have made important contributions to the quality of life on this planet, such as directly saving countless lives through its refugee and emergency relief programs. These broad achievements, however, have been overshadowed by the problems that weight so heavily upon us. The problems are old, but it is not too late to commit ourselves to a new beginning, a beginning fresh with the ideals of the U.N. Charter.

Today, at the beginning of this 38th Session, I solemnly pledge my Nation to upholding the original ideals of the United Nations. Our goals are those that guide this very body. Our ends are the same as those of the U.N.'s founders, who sought to replace a world at war with one where the rule of law would prevail, where human rights were honored, where development would blossom, where conflict would give way to freedom from violence.

In 1956, President Dwight Eisenhower made an observation on weaponry and deterrence in a letter to a publisher. He wrote: "When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both sides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die." He went on to say, "* * * we have already come to the point where safety cannot be assumed by arms alone * * * their usefulness becomes concentrated more and more in their characteristics as deterrents than in instruments with which to obtain victory * * *"

Distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, as we persevere, if in the search for a more secure world, we must do everything we can to let diplomacy triumph. Diplomacy, the most honorable of professions, can bring the most blessed of gifts, the gift of peace. If we succeed, the world will find an excitement and accomplishment in peace beyond that which could ever be imagined through violence and war.

I want to leave you today with a message I have often spoken about to the citizens of my own country, especially in times when I have felt thay were discouraged and unsure. I say it to you with as much hope and heart as I have said it to my own people. You have the right to dream great dreams. You have the right to seek a better world for your people. And all of us have the responsibility to work for that better world. And, as caring, peaceful peoples, think what a powerful force for good we could be. Distinguished delegates, let us regain the dream the United Nations once dreamed.

ORDERS FOR TUESDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CHAFEE TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order there be a special order in favor of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE) for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time remaining after the execution of the special order until 12 noon be devoted to the transaction of routine morning business in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM 12 NOON UNTIL 2 P.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, tomorrow is Tuesday, the day for the regular caucuses on both sides of the aisle. It has been our habit of late to recess the Senate so those caucuses can proceed. I ask unanimous consent that from 12 noon until 2 p.m. the Senate stand in recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PENDING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I inquire of the Chair, when the Senate resumes its session at 2 p.m., what will be the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate Joint Resolution 159.

Mr. BAKER. Which is the war powers resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The war powers resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will not now attempt to enter a unanimous-consent order to provide for a time for debate on the resolution tomorrow, but from previous conversations with the minority leader today I believe that both sides were going to try to clear a unanimous-consent order that would provide 4 hours of debate tomorrow equally divided between the hours of 2 p.m. and 6 p.m. Additional time, of course, will be provided as it is needed on Wednesday and perhaps on Thursday. I do not now make that request, Mr. President.

VITIATION OF SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am now told that the Senator from Rhode Island does not require the special order on tomorrow. I am confident it has nothing to do with the outcome of America's Cup Race since the American boat is behind.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the special order in favor of Senator CHAFEE be vitiated and that additional time be devoted to the transaction of routine morning business as previously provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:14 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, September 27, 1983, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 26, 1983:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

JOYCE ADKINS RAUPE: IN APPRECIATION

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs recently lost a valued friend and former employee who was deeply loved and admired by many of our current Members and staff. Joyce Adkins Raupe, whose beloved husband, Craig Raupe, served for many years as a senior aide to our distinguished majority leader, until his retirement to Granbury, Tex., in 1979, lost her valiant struggle with cancer on July 27 of this year.

To all who were privileged to know her, Joyce Raupe was a very special person—whose professional dedication was only surpassed by her warm, attractive personality; her thoughtfulness and consideration of others; and the devotion she was able to inspire in her closest colleagues and associates. She was a gentle lady with a very strong, influential character, and she will be deeply missed.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point a collection of prayers, scripture readings, and a homily which was read at Joyce's funeral service, held at the Granbury Presbyterian Church on July 30. I also include, following this material, a most eloquent eulogy which was delivered by the Raupes' close friend and a distinguished journalist, Mr. Larry L. King.

These words of recognition and comfort will, I hope, help to assuage the heavy loss suffered by Joyce's family—to all of whom I extend my deepest sympathy.

MEMORIAL MESSAGE FOR JOYCE ADKINS RAUPE

(By Hon. Jim Wright)

The Psalmist asked: "When I survey the heavens, the work of Thy hands, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained, What is man that thou art mindful of him?"

In the Gospel of John, we find the answer: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

And he said: "I came that Ye might have life, and have it more abundantly."

PRAYER

Our Father, in whose presence the generations rise and pass away, and in whose sight a hundred years can be as but a day:

We grope for understanding in this our time of sorrow, and know full well that we can never truly comprehend the mysteries of thy infinite mind. There is so much we do not understand.

We thank thee for the portion of thy purpose which thou hast revealed to us in the person and spirit of Joyce, through whom we glimpsed an intimation of thy tender mercies and a reflection of thy love.

For all she meant to each of us we give our thanks. Be merciful to her who showed forth mercy, we pray; be kind to her who showed such kindness; and as she shared her love unsparingly with those entrusted to her care, be lavish in thy love for her whom we entrust to thee.

Comfort those who mourn her loss, and grant that the words of our mouths and the meditations of our hearts may be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our redeemer. Amen.

SCRIPTURES

Psalm 23

"The Lord is my shepherd: I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his Name's sake.

"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou are with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

"Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil, my cup runneth over.

"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the House of the Lord forever."

John 14: 1-5

"Let not your heart be troubled: Ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my father's house are many mansions: If it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

"And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

I Cor. 13

"Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

"And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing.

"And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing.

"Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not, it vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.

"Doth not behave itself unseemingly, seeketh not its own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

"Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

"Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

"Love never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they all fail; whether there be tongues, they all cease; whether there be knowledge; it shall vanish away.

"For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

"But when that which is perfect is come, than that which is in part shall be done away.

"When I was a child, I spake as a child, I thought as a child, I understood as a child. But when I became a man, I put away childish things.

"For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: Now I know in part, but then shall I know even as also I am known.

"And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three: But the greatest of these is love."

HOMILY

We feel so powerless in the presence of death. Mere words seem empty and futile. And yet, it is words that set man above beast. So in this imperfect medium we strive at such a time as this to express the feeling within us.

Dear Joyce. She was in many ways a very private person. what dignity she had; and what an example she was. She was not didactic nor argumentative about her religious faith. With her it was a quiet and personal thing. She believed in a hereafter; in a divine order to the universe; and she believed that God is love. She preferred simply to live her faith rather than talking a lot about it, or entering into disputations of religious orthodoxy.

As a rational person, Joyce could see that the God of the Universe has given us intimations of our immortality everywhere we look.

We feel it in our instincts. As surely as a homing pidgeon returns to its nest, from the beginning of the human race men and women of all cultures have felt the magnetic pull that draws us to hope for eternity—and to believe in it.

We see it all about us in nature. The sun sets each night to rise again. Every springtime is a resurrection. The caterpillar sheds its earth-bound crust for wings to soar into a higher state of life, not knowing the wonders that await it.

How can we expect to comprehend the next phase that awaits the spirit, freed of its earthbound mold? The unborn infant, carried in its mother's womb, knows nothing of the world outside. Just so, can it be that what we call death liberates the spirit just as severing the umbilical cord liberates the infant to a newer, broader, freer life?

Joyce Raupe had a fine sense of justice. And this very sense of justice tells us that the God we worship would not mock us with these yearnings for immortality and hints of eternity to come only to deny us the fruits of that yearning which he has planted within us.

"Which of you, if his son shall ask bread would give him a stone?

"Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?

"If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? (Matt. 7:9 ff.)

Craig Raupe once said to me that the surest antidote to brooding resentment is to think of the things for which to be grateful. "You simply cannot feel gratitude and resentment at the same time."

Can we not, then, be grateful that, caught in the grip of cancer, Joyce did not linger to suffer pain. And yet be grateful too that she knew and faced with clear and honest eyes the fate that was to come—so soon—and was content.

POEM

What is this thing that men call death?
Our friend before us lies; in all save breath
She seems the same as yesterday. Her face
So like to life, so calm, bears not a trace
Of that great change which all of us so dread.
We gaze on her and say: She is not dead,
But sleeps; and soon she will arise and take Us by the hand. We know she will awake
And smile on us as she did yesterday:
And she will have some gentle word to say.
Some kindly deed to do; for loving thought
Was warp and woof of which her life was wrought.
She is not dead. Such souls forever live
In boundless measure of the love they give.

CLOSING PRAYER

O God, who healest the broken in heart, and bindest up their wounds: Look in tender pity and compassion upon thy servants whose joy has been turned into mourning. Leave them not comfortless, but grant that they may be drawn closer to thee and to one another by their common sorrow.

Fill their souls with the light and comfort of thy presence. Grant unto them such a vision of that life wherein all myseries shall be revealed, and all tears be wiped away, that they may be able to endure as seeing thee who are invisible.

So dwell with them and be their God, until the day break and the shadows flee away, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Our Father, who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy Kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as it is in Heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for thine is the Kingdom, the power and the glory, forever and ever, Amen.

BENEDICTION

May the Lord bless you and keep you.

The Lord make his face to shine upon you and be gracious unto you.

The Lord lift up his countenance upon you and give you peace. Amen.

EULOGY FOR JOYCE ADKINS RAUPE

(By Larry L. King)

I like to think that we're here to celebrate the life of Joyce Adkins Raupe.

We're here to acknowledge her death, yes, to lay her to rest and to give such comfort as we may to those she left behind. But we would be remiss if we failed to celebrate and remember—with as much cheer as this day's events will permit us to muster—what her life was about, what she did with that life, and how she viewed life itself.

The surface impression that Joyce gave was one of serenity, graciousness, and an air sometimes bordering on the regal. And she was all of those. But people who knew her best also knew that, in the very best definition of the word, her life was a cacophony of real human emotions. It at once epitomized humor, understanding, compassion, beauty, and, yes, anger and its kindred emotions when she encountered the unjust or the unthinking or the unkind. For Joyce Adkins Raupe was emphatic about her likes and her dislikes. She had her standards and her beliefs; one of the things I most admired was that she refused, for very long, to suffer fools gladly. Indeed, she could be something of the doctrinaire. Some might consider the word "doctrinaire" to be a perjorative—but to me that perfectly respectable word means someone who is unafraid to defend or espouse their particular visions or theories. And Joyce certainly was in that mold.

I first knew Joyce Raupe in early 1955, shortly after she and her husband, Craig, came to Washington. Craig was there to be the new Administrative Assistant to a young 32-year-old freshman Congressman from Weatherford by the name of Jim Wright. I had the good luck to live as a neighbor to Craig and Joyce almost from the day they arrived in town. Our children shared playpens and playgrounds and we, the young adults, shared the dreams and hopes and aspirations of the fresh and eager. Of money we had little, and so we amused ourselves with word games and charades and political debates and heated personal proclamations. It was then and there that I began to understand that Joyce could be funny and opininated and reflective, and that she possessed a keen intelligence.

I have fond memories of many stories she told. One of my favorites concerned how, years ago, Joyce and Craig were walking down the street of one little Texas town or another. And as they passed a battered old parked car in a scabby section of town, they saw sitting on the old car a ragged, snaggled-toothed little boy with a million dollar grin on his face. He obviously was proud of something in a time and a place when his family had not had much to be proud of. And as Joyce and Craig drew even with the little fellow he beamed and shouted proudly, "We got butane!" Throughout the remainder of her life, when something good happened to her or to her family, Joyce likely would announce it by saying to friends, "We got butane!"

Joyce Adkins Raupe began her life in Hillsboro, Texas on March 9, 1928, the daughter of the late J. M. Adkins and Viola Curry Adkins. After graduating from high school she enrolled at North Texas State College—where she became a Campus Beauty Queen and Campus Favorite in 1948. She was an honors graduate who never made any grade lower than an "A"—no matter the course—throughout college.

It was at North Texas State that she met her husband—and our dear friend—Craig Raupe. They were married on June 5th, 1948, and so only a few weeks ago attained their 35th Anniversary together in a time when America is not noted for long and successful marriages. In an era when there often seemed not much time or room for great love affairs, Joyce and Craig truly had one. Craig himself has said in recent days that their life together was so classical as "to seem almost scripted." And that long and loving union, too, is something we celebrate here today.

Joyce wanted from her union with Craig two sons—that was her wish, that was her goal, and she got exactly what she wanted: two fine sons in Carl and Joel. Anyone who says those boys grow up under her love and guidance and shaping had to know they would turn out to be good people—just as they have.

In her 35 years of marriage to Craig, Joyce Raupe lived in the amazing total of 47 different houses by actual count. Sometimes it must have seemed to her that her husband was a rolling stone or an unidentified flying object, so often did they change houses and cities and states—and even countries. Joyce was not always wildly enthusiastic about those many moves. The one to Washington in late 1954 removed her from her native state, family, and old friends; the one to Indonesia in the early 1960s took her to a strange and distant land, and away from her beloved America. But in each case, Joyce spent little time in mourning or in recriminations, but rather set about to bring order and care and a touch of home to yet another wayside stop.

For a smalltown Texas girl, Joyce Adkins Raupe saw much of the world, learned a great deal about it, and helped in some measure to shape it. In addition to her travels with her husband, who for some years was a senior Foreign Service Officer and Diplomat, she later traveled in her own right as a senior professional on the staff of the House Foreign Affairs Committee—to Eastern Europe, China, Egypt, Greece. And she was a member of official delegations to Interparliamentary conferences in Mexico and other points in the Western Hemisphere. Though she had spent much of her life as a housewife and mother—after starting as a teacher at Weatherford College—Joyce rapidly rose in her congressional career from receptionist to a respected senior staff professional. I think none who knew her were surprised, though all who knew her were made proud.

Our friend Joyce did not want to die, no. But in the brief time of her last illness she became fully accepting of the fact that she must and soon would. With that indomitable spirit of hers, she actually joked with her husband in her last days. She told him, "I'm turning the tables on you" and she added, "Well, at least I'll never be an old woman in a rest home." And then she laughed.

On Craig and Joyce's 35th anniversary, less than two months ago, Craig—perhaps impractically in the circumstances, but Lord love him for doing it—gave her as a gift a beautiful, full-length silver fox fur coat, as a token of what she had meant to him in their long and loving life together. Joyce was fated never to wear that gift of love outside her home. But in the generous spirit for which she was known, and shall long be remembered, she asked Craig to see that it will go to a friend and colleague with whom she worked in Washington. Joyce thought of others even in her last days.

Joyce Raupe was a rare person who learned much but who never forgot her old values or turned her back on her past. In her role as a staff professional in Congress, and in her role as the wife of a senior diplomat, she rubbed shoulders with the powerful and the noted of her time. She became a sophisticated and gracious hostess, one who could carry her end of any conversation or deal with small crises of protocol. And yet, away from the glitter and glamour, she remained friendly and downhome—an "old shoe" who could let her hair down and enjoy anew the old and simple games and stories and friends of her younger yesterdays.

I have been trying to say what most of you know—that Joyce Adkins Raupe was a good woman, of solid stock, and that in this blessedly polyglot diverse nation of ours she somehow remained uniquely and proudly American in her life and in her values.

We who are gathered extend today such comfort as it is ours to give to those Joyce left behind—to her beloved husband and our dear friend, Craig Raupe; to her sons, Carl and Joel Raupe; to her mother, Mrs. Viola Curry Adkins; to her sisters, Thelma Jo Adkins Stewart and Doris Pauline Adkins; to her brother, Edward Neal Adkins; to her daughters-in-law, Terry Meyers Raupe and Lourdes Raupe; and to her little grandson, Craig Ricardo Raupe. We would ask them to remember with us—her friends—that while we shall not again see Joyce in the flesh, we—all of us—will carry in our hearts, and in our mind's eye, pictures and memories of her that shall remain fresh and green so long as we shall live.

May Joyce rest in peace, after jobs well-done and a life well-lived, and throughout eternity may she always have butane.●

NEW JERSEY CITIZENS TRANSPORTATION COUNCIL SUPPORTS RAIL LINE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of New Jersey is currently considering whether to come up with State matching funds for the rehabilitation of the rail line between Philadelphia and Atlantic City. The New Jersey Citizens Transportation Council, in a letter to the Governor, has strongly urged his support for this project.

The letter follows.

NEW JERSEY CITIZENS TRANSPORTATION COUNCIL,
Newark, N.J., September 15, 1983.

Hon. THOMAS KEAN,
Governor, State of New Jersey, State House, Trenton, N.J.

DEAR GOVERNOR KEAN: We urge you to move as rapidly as possible to assure that the State receives $30 million in federal railroad improvement funds which will make possible the operation of rail service between Atlantic City and Philadelphia.

The commitment by the State of approximately $2.5 million a year for three years to make this much-needed project possible, seems a small sum to pay to achieve such important economic gains for the South Jersey area, which will ultimately represent gains for the entire state. This project is not of exclusive value to casinos, but for the entire resort complex.

The savings in highway repairs and police services, and the gains in the general economy can hardly be argued. We believe it is outmoded to argue, as some do, that certain areas are aided more than others. Obviously almost no project can be of equal direct advantage to every area and every segment of the economy. What is true is that any economic or social advantage eventually helps the entire economy and society. Less taxes are needed overall, less strain on roads, police, emergency services, and above all, greater convenience to the traveling public. This will also provide transportation for all communities from Camden to Atlantic City and provides jobs in Atlantic City for these communities.

We ask you to exert your greatest influence to advance this important project.

Sincerely,

ROBERT H. FRANKLIN,
Chairman.
RAYMOND F. MALE,
President.●

THE RETIREMENT OF CARL "YAZ" YASTRZEMSKI

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, the American drive for success is common; the attainment of perfection is unique. Those few individuals whose fastidious efforts make them true heroes deserve our recognition and reverence.

This Saturday, one of our Nation's true heroes will retire from the art that made him great. Carl "Yaz" Yastrzemski will pick up the bat one last time, enter the box, shift his weight to his back leg, wait for the perfect pitch, and give his myriad fans a final taste of the sweetness of a great hit.

Unfortunately, not everyone in this House will be able to witness the thrill of this final performance, or share in the sadness of each Red Sox fan as Yaz walks back to the dugout one last time.

The following tribute to Yaz appeared in this morning's New York Times. I take this opportunity to share it with my colleagues:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 26, 1983]

YASTRZEMSKI SEEKS THE PERFECT SWING IN HIS FINAL INNINGS

(By Steve Cady)

The message taped to the back of his locker told as much as anything else about the ballplayer's dedication.

"In box with left leg and all weight on it," the note read. "Nothing on front leg. WAIT." Below that were scrawled the words "Stay Back" and "Relax."

Could this be the urgent reminder of a promising rookie left-handed hitter brought up to the big club for a late-season audition? Not exactly. Carl Yastrzemski was a major league rookie in 1961, the year he replaced Ted Williams as left fielder for the Boston Red Sox.

"I just write stuff down and put it up there," the legend known as "Yaz" was saying in the Red Sox locker room before a recent game at Fenway Park. "I've always made adjustments."

He will undoubtedly be making them this week at Yankee Stadium, where the Red Sox meet the Yankees in a three-game series beginning Tuesday night.

For Yastrzemski, 44 years old, "always" goes back nearly to the cradle. It started on a Long Island potato farm with a 2-year-old son squealing "Bat!" and whacking a tennis ball tossed underhand by a hopeful father. It continued through grade school and at Bridgehampton High, where the boy then known as "Sonny" once hit safely in 26 consecutive times at bat and where he and Billy DePetris, a pitcher, led a school with only 80 students to two straight Suffolk County baseball championships. It will end here next weekend, when Yastrzemski, arguably the most durable super-star in baseball history, calls it a career after 23 seasons with the Red Sox.

He was dressing slowly now, as reverently as a priest preparing to celebrate another mass. Off went the shower clogs he had been wearing in the locker room. On went the first set of stockings, up over the feet that have been digging toe-holds in major league batters' boxes for nearly a quarter of a century.

A little gray has crept into the brown sideburns. But the 182-pound body is still lean and hard, the arms still powerful, the vision still 20/20, the hand-eye coordination still intact. Until the Red Sox faltered this summer, Yastrzemski had helped keep them close in his role as designated hitter/pinch-hitter against right-handed pitching. Many of his teammates think he could help them next year, too. But Captain Carl has apparently made up his mind.

"It's still fun playing baseball," he said, "but I think it's about time to stop. I wouldn't want a team just carrying me for a year."

Eventually, the familiar vestments would be in place: From the spikes and red stockings to the red-trimmed jersey with No. 8 on it. But Yastrzemski would interrupt the ritual long enough to eat a hamburger brought in by a clubhouse attendant, to smoke a cigarette, to autograph another box of baseballs and, sitting on a canvas deck chair in front of his locker, to give his personal assessment of the famous Yaz hitting style.

"I just try to hit the ball hard," he said. "Hard contact. If you get the right pitch and you put the right swing on it, the ball goes. It takes care of itself."

For Yastrzemski, both at the plate and in the field, the ball has taken care of itself with remarkable consistency. Others have hit more home runs or reached base more often or had a higher batting average. But nobody else has played in as many major-league games—3,303. And nobody else has done so many different things so well. Some of those highlights, at least partially complete, have been visible all season on the Yaz Pennants sold at the Fenway Park souvenir booths: Golden Glover . . . '67 Triple Crown . . . M.V.P. . . . 400 Home Runs . . . 3,000 Hits . . . '67-'75 World Series . . . 18 All-Star Games. How, the baseball world continues to ask, has Yaz managed to defy the laws of athletic gravity so long?

"Real hard work," says Carl Yastrzemski Sr., the father who bought the tiny 18-inch wooden bat his son dragged behind him at the age of 2. "Hard work's what did it. A lot of players with talent don't work at it, and they're gone before you know it. Carl worked at it."

As the message taped to his locker indicates, the younger Yastrzemski is still working at it, still searching for the ultimate swing even as he nears the end of the line. That perfect swing could come this week at Yankee Stadium. Or it could come against the Cleveland Indians next weekend at Fenway, where "Yaz Day" on Saturday and the final game of the season on Sunday have been sold out for nearly a month.

"Lemme tell you something," said Walt Hriniak, the Red Sox bullpen coach who has worked with Yastrzemski on his batting for the last seven seasons. "There's no such thing as a born hitter. They think and they work. And that's what makes 'em great. Carl has never stopped trying to find a way of getting better."

In Hriniak's view, Yastrzemski's willingness to "pay the price" physically and emotionally, has carried him further than talent alone could have done.

"We've looked at films at 8:30 A.M. during spring training," the coach said, "and we've hit at 8:30 P.M. We hit after games during the season. We hit in the rain and we hit in the mud. He's changed his batting stance dozens of times. He was always interested in ideas."

Manager Ralph Houk of the Red sox cites outstanding physical condition, an energetic personality, strong wrists and a nonstop zest for playing baseball, all supplementing a Hall of Fame talent.

"For most of his years," notes Houk, "Yaz has been a complete ball player: A great outfielder, a good base runner and a hitter for good average with power."

As Yaz plays out the string, the scene has taken on the promotional flavor of a carnival sideshow. Final salutes have been flashed on scoreboards around the league, complete with career statistics, and the departing hero has acknowledged one ovation after another. An admiring press has been following him with cameras, tape recorders and notebooks since spring training.

He has answered questions about his four children ("I think Mike can be a major leaguer"), about his yearly salaries of $500,000 or more ("I could have left two or three times, but I've been treated very well here"), about the possibility of a movie on his life ("There won't be any, because I wouldn't allow it") and about his plans ("just disappear and go fishing.") At this point, the legend is beyond reproach.

It wasn't always that way. In a city whose sports fans and sports writers are known for the sharpness of their teeth, Yastrzemski has not always occupied the pedestal on which he stands today.

Rightly or wrongly, he has been held responsible for the dismissal of three of the 10 mangers for whom he has toiled and for the trading of several teammates. His earlier shyness was often misconstrued for moodiness or aloofness. At times, during the years when controversy seemed to be his middle name, he was accused of being disruptive, self-centered, uncooperative, even lazy.

"It's a bad rap," says George Scott, a former teammate. "The man played hard. And he played hurt. That's a team player. A guy who does his job."

A close friend, Eddie Popowski, a former Red Sox coach and interim manager, thinks it was the challenge of the 1967 pennant race that finally brought out the best in Yastrzemski. Popowski already knew what a perfectionist the newcomer could be from their 1960 season together at the Class AAA farm club in Minneapolis, where Popowski was manager and Yastrzemski had been shifted from shortstop to left field after a year at Raleigh, N.C.

"Yaz got eight hits in one doubleheader at Minneapolis," said Popowski, who moved to Boston the next year along with Yastrzemski. "But he said to me after the second game, 'I just don't feel comfortable up there.' Can you imagine that? So a couple of us threw batting practice to him for half an hour."

Yastrzemski got a single in his first major league trip to the plate, on April 11, 1961. But his first six seasons at Boston failed to shake the Red Sox out of a country-club image that portrayed them as overpaid and underambitious "Fenway Millionaires" pampered by an indulgent owner, Tom Yawkey. In those six seasons, Boston never finished closer than sixth place or 19 games behind. They never even had a .500 season.

Then came 1967, the year Yastrzemski led the Red Sox to the American League pennant at odds of 100-1 and won the so-called Triple Crown by topping the league in batting (.326), runs batted in (121) and home runs (44). His salary was doubled, to $100,000.

"He told me in spring training that year he thought we had a shot at it," Popowski recalled. He said, 'It's going to be great when every hit means something, when every putout means something.' Yaz became a cheerleader, he was incredible that year. A single, he'd stretch it into a double. We needed a home run, he'd hit one. He'd play the wall. Throw the winning run out at the plate, throw the tying run out at second or third."

Since then, the Red Sox finished above .500 for 16 straight seasons, although they probably will not reach that this year. As for the alleged Yastrzemski aloofness, Popowski feels it was never a problem after 1967. "He always got along with ballplayers. I never saw him get angry enough to want to fight with any other ballplayer. Maybe an umpire, but not a ballplayer."

Outside Billy's Triple Crown, a restaurant in Bridgehampton, near the eastern end of Long Island, an eightfoot likeness of Carl Yastrzemski sets the motif.

Inside, both at the bar and in the dining rooms, the walls are adorned with 240 photographs, portraits and cartoons devoted to baseball's 13 triple-crown winners. More than half of the pictures, 140 of them, show Yastrzemski in action from the fourth grade to the present. There is a special Yaz Room, and the house specialities include a Yaz Dog, made with Polish sausage and served on Italian bread with sauerkraut.

The restaurant belongs to Billy DePetris, who admittedly is a little partial to Yastrzemski. They played baseball, football and basketball together for Bridgehampton High in the middle 1950's. One year, DePetris pitched six no-hitters; his catcher, Yastrzemski, hit for averages as high as .756.

Both also played summers during high school for the Bridgehampton White Eagles, a town team organized by Carl Yastrzemski Sr. In addition to his father, three of Yastrzemski's uncles and a number of cousins played for the White Eagles.

How long has Yastrzemski been a perfectionist?

"As long as I've known him," says his longtime friend and one-time teammate. "If he went 3 for 4 one day, he'd want to go 4 for 4 the next day. I knew when he was 13 years old he was going to make it big."

Eventually, so did the major league scouts. On Nov. 28, 1958, after Yastrzemski had started his sophomore year at Notre Dame, he was signed for a bonus by Frank (Bots) Nekola of the Red Sox. The initial cost for 23 seasons of big-league excellence? A bargain $108,000.

A dusty silver and green charter bus waited near Gate B at Fenway Park, ready to take the Red Sox to the airport for one more road trip.

Young autograph-hunters wearing Yaz caps and holding Yaz pennants crowded closer. Yastrzemski had not gotten to play on this particular day, even when the rival team switched to a right-handed pitcher in the eighth inning and the crowd chanted, "We Want Yaz!" Customers younger than 22 hadn't even been born when Yastrzemski made his big-league debut here, on the same day Maj. Yuri Gagarin of the Soviet Union became the first man in space.

A lot of Red Sox fans have never learned how to spell Yastrzemski's name, and a few of them still have trouble pronouncing "Yah-STREM-ski." But even the toddlers can say "Yaz," and that is the term of endearment Captain Carl will be taking with him to the Hall of Fame.

"When you talk Boston baseball," said Pam Pushas of South Windsor, Conn., "you talk Yaz. From now on, it's still going to be a ball game when we come to Boston to see the Red Sox play. But it won't be the same." ●

GOOD PROGRAMS FINISH LAST

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, today's Washington Post editorial, which follows, makes a compelling case for the funding of one miniscule program which works.

Cutting it is, indeed, "bad management and bad politics."

GOOD PROGRAMS FINISH LAST

The Department of Labor has decided to end funding for a youth employment program that seems to meet every administration criterion for success. The program is inexpensive, oriented toward the private-sector and has a good record. It enjoys strong support among GOP stalwarts both in Congress and among business people. What could justify this self-destructive behavior?

The program in question, run by a firm named 70001 Ltd., finds jobs for the hardest-to-place youth in more than 50 sites around the country. Most participants are minority young people from poor families who often drop out before reaching high school. While low-cost placement programs such as 70001 have little effect on the ability to employ a person in the long run, the program has had enormous success in reducing the disastrously high levels of unemployment from which its target population generally suffers. Over 80 percent of youths who complete a brief program of job preparation are placed in jobs; the program works closely with private employees, and they give good ratings to program graduates. Its secret ingredient seems to be that rare quality: good management.

So successful has the program been that 31 senators—including Paul Laxalt, John Tower, Richard Lugar, Steve Symms, Robert Dole and Paula Hawkins—have urged the department to continue support. The Labor Department has not responded to their letter, but it says otherwise that it is greatly reducing its funding of nationwide programs such as 70001, a decision consistent with the administration's philosophy of giving more discretion to states and localities.

Giving them the flexibility to tailor job program needs to local conditions is a fine idea—as far as it goes. But under the CETA system, state and local governments already had plenty of discretion. What most CETA operators lacked was good federal guidance and successful program models. In fact, most of 70001's money already comes from public and private sources in local areas. But federal money provided a core of support essential to the firm's ability to coordinate, monitor and expand its network.

For an operation like 70001 to market itself to hundreds of states and localities, each with its own set of rules, is a bewildering and expensive business that such a low-overhead operation cannot afford on its own. Perhaps over time the firm can further reduce its dependency on national funding. But abruptly cutting off that essential support in the name of consistency is bad management and bad politics.●

BALANCING THE DEBATE ON EDB

HON. JOHN N. ERLENBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago the Labor Standards Subcommittee held a hearing castigating the Occupational Safety and Health Administration for failing to promulgate a new exposure standard for ethylene dibromide (EDB).

EDB, a toxic chemical shown to have caused an excess incidence of nasal and spleen cancers and reproductory disorders in laboratory animals, is used as a fumigant for grains, citrus fruits, nuts, and vegetables and to prevent the spread of disease and insects such as the Mediterranean fruit fly. EDB is also used in leaded gasoline as a scavenger.

One issue debated was OSHA's decision in 1981 to deny the Teamsters' petition for an emergency temporary standard (ETS) on EDB pursuant to section 6(c) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act. This decision was considered by some subcommittee members as mistaken, but as Assistant Secretary Thorne Auchter states below, OSHA's deicsion was well-considered and, importantly, taken with full knowledge of EDB's toxicity. To its credit, OSHA did not let the issue drop but moved ahead in developing a permanent standard which is now before OMB for clearance. This standard is more comprehensive than that recommended by NIOSH or adopted by California's OSHA program, which OSHA had been urged to adopt as its own. I urge OMB to consider OSHA's proposal expeditiously.

To its credit, as well, it is this administration that will promulgate an EDB standard, where the prior administration failed to do so. I make this point only because there are those who would want everyone to believe that the Reagan administration is opposed to, or incapable of, protecting workers' health, in contrast to the Carter administration. In fact, OSHA was aware of the need to reduce EDB exposure limits as early as 1977, with NIOSH's recommendations, followed in 1978 by a NIOSH "Current Intelligence Bulletin" underscoring EDB's toxicity. Still the Carter administration failed to produce an EDB standard.

Not only will this administration promulgate a new EDB standard, but will do so having overcome attempts by certain House majority Members to cut OSHA's budget for research during debate this past year on the Labor Department's fiscal 1983 appropriation. Had it not been for adoption of the Craig amendment—which organized labor opposed—restoring $4 million for OSHA research, research critical to evolution of the proposed standard would have been thwarted.

One final comment: I would hope that these health issues could be debated without the emotion which can cloud judgment and misinform or frighten the public. Misrepresentation serves no one's long-term interests.

Mr. Auchter's statement, which appeared as a guest column in USA Today for September 20, 1983, follows:

[From USA Today, Sept. 20, 1983]

OSHA ACTION WAS PROMPT, RESPONSIBLE

(By Thorne G. Auchter, guest columnist)

WASHINGTON.—Ethylene dibromide (EDB), a fumigant used in the citrus, grain and papaya industries, is highly toxic and a suspected human carcinogen. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration will soon propose a comprehensive standard to protect workers exposed to this chemical.

The proposed standard will include a low permissible exposure limit, respirator use where necessary, medical surveillance of employes, worker training and education, and monitoring of exposure levels.

The information needed to propose a standard has cost OSHA about $300,000 and taken nearly two years to collect.

When we started this process in 1981, we had little information about the problems posed by EDB. We did know from animal test data that OSHA's existing permissible exposure limit of 20 parts EDB per million parts air (20 ppm) was not adequate to protect workers. What we didn't know was now many workers were exposed and at what levels.

In September, 1981, OSHA was petitioned by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters to issue an emergency temporary standard for EDB. According to the Occupational Safety and Health Act, OSHA may issue an emergency standard if it determines that workers are exposed to a "grave danger" and that emergency action is necessary.

Various courts have struck down four such emergency standards issued by OSHA in the past. To sustain an emergency standard in court—and more important, to comply with the law—OSHA would not only have to show that EDB at 20 ppm is dangerous, but that workers were actually being exposed to dangerous levels of EDB. We simply did not have that kind of information.

I therefore decided to initiate regular rulemaking to produce a new, permanent standard for EDB. We have since gathered a great amount of information about EDB, including exposure data that substantiate our 1981 decision.

Actual exposure levels, based on nearly a thousand samples, are very low. Furthermore, most workers are exposed only intermittently to EDB, not continuously for a working lifetime, which is the assumption on which animal test data are based.

We have taken other steps outside the regulatory process. In November, 1981, we recommended respirator use and personal hygiene practices for exposed workers. And we determined that less EDB can be used to fumigate produce and still have the same effect against insects. As a result, less EDB is now being manufactured and used.

OSHA's actions have been prompt and responsible. We have identified the full scope of the problem and are creating a comprehensive, effective solution.

(Thorne G. Auchter is assistant secretary of labor for occupational safety and health.)●

HHS COMES THROUGH FOR HONEY HUNTER

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend to the attention of my colleagues the story of a very special little girl, Honey Hunter, whose illness and exacting medical expenses posed a harsh burden for her family, that resides in my district in Gloucester Township. Honey Hunter's family, of whom I have personal knowledge, faced a problem common to many—the inability to afford the high medical bills that result from long-term illnesses. Luckily, I am happy to inform my colleagues today that Honey Hunter's life was made easier when her special needs were addressed by responsive government and she was found eligible for supplemental security income (SSI).

When Honey Hunter was born in February 1980, she choked on her placenta and this caused serious brain damage. As a result, she now suffers from grand mal seizures that last for weeks at a time. She received a pacemaker because of repeated heart failure. She cannot swallow and must be fed a special formula through a tube connected to her stomach.

The multiplicity and severity of her condition require constant medication and life-saving medical equipment, as well as intensive physical therapy. This prescription adds up to a bill in excess of $500,000, which is well beyond normal means.

Despite this, Honey's mother, Caroline, wanted to care for her at home. She learned to properly administer the necessary care but could not literally afford to do so. Yet, Caroline knew that Honey's life depended on a strong family environment.

Supplemental security income (SSI) was not at first available to the Hunters as they were disqualified by their income. Having exhausted all medical insurance coverage, Caroline was being forced into the situation of either institutionalizing Honey or separating from her husband and going on welfare. Something is seriously faulty with a system that allows no other option. When it became apparent that it was not only more cost-effective to care for an individual at home but also that there is no measurable price tag for the benefits of being surrounded by a warm and loving environment, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services proposed regulation changes to right this wrong.

Fortunately, Honey's story has a happy ending. Because of the Health and Human Services regulation change, the Hunters were found eligible for supplemental security income at last. Today, Honey is at home, where her mother fought so hard to be able to keep her.

I am certainly pleased to have had the opportunity to work closely with the Hunters and their many friends in this most worthwhile effort. Honey is a little girl whose plight has touched many hearts. I commend Honey and her family for their patience and perseverance and wish them all the best.●

OIL BRINGS WEALTH, PROBLEMS TO NIGERIA

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, this is the fifth in a series of six recently published articles on sub-Saharan Africa written by Nicholas D. Kristof, a Rhodes scholar from Yamhill, Oreg.

OIL BRINGS WEALTH, PROBLEMS TO NIGERIA

(By Nicholas D. Kristof)

LAGOS, NIGERIA.—Most struggling African countries, locked in a vicious circle of poverty, salivate at the thought of Nigeria's billions of dollars in oil revenue. But, ironically, Nigeria's immense problems arise precisely because it is so rich.

Like a child let loose with a credit card in a candy store, Nigeria has overindulged. While recent press reports have focused on the immediate problem of a plunge in export income caused by the world petroleum glut, the larger problem is that Nigeria simply has economic indigestion from trying to absorb so much money so quickly. In the long run, Nigeria could regret it ever had oil.

At Nigeria's independence in 1960, 90 percent of the nation's export earnings came from agricultural products and only 2.6 percent from oil. Now 90 percent of export earnings come from oil, and Nigeria is a net food importer.

In 1960, Nigeria was a major exporter of peanuts, palm oil, rubber and cocoa. Now it is a net importer of all those products but cocoa, and even cocoa production is just half what it was 15 years ago. Food now accounts for 15 percent of Nigeria's imports.

Agriculture is just one facet of a broader problem. Giddy and bloated from its oil windfall, Nigeria abandoned its traditional economic sectors and embarked on a lavish and wasteful spending program. Now the country is addicted to free-spending ways that alter not only the economy but also the society.

Government capital spending rose 1,000 percent from 1973 to 1975, as schools, hospitals, banks and office buildings rose out of nowhere. The government has allocated $17 billion to the building of a new capital city—to be called Abuja—more than 300 miles from Lagos.

This wild spending spree brought two fundamental difficulties. The first was that the country's infrastructure (roads, telephones and railways) couldn't keep up and there were not enough educated people to fill office jobs.

English is the only language common to all parts of Nigeria, but it is almost everyone's second language. So finding competent teachers, nurses, civil servants and businessmen for the new boom has been impossible. Moreover, the boom has focused on the cities, so that urban workers on average earn almost five times as much as rural workers.

The result was a migration to the cities; vast shanty towns have sprung up amid filth and pestilence on the outskirts of Lagos. Crime has soared—many robbers carry machine guns—and prices have soared to the point that annual rent for an executive's house in Lagos can be $75,000 or more. Corruption—called "dash"—is everywhere: Bribes are the grease that runs the country. Travelers commonly describe Lagos as the armpit of the world.

The second fundamental problem with Nigeria's development, and the most serious, is that all this wealth comes from one finite source. So long as the oil money streams in, Nigeria will be able to lurch along in its intoxicated way. But if there is any interruption in the oil revenue, then Nigeria is left twisting in the wind—conceivably in a worse position than if it had never drilled for oil, for dependence on oil has led Nigeria to abandon its agricultural surplus and has bred dizzying expectations in the people.

An omen came a few months ago when the government ordered all commercial banks to stop issuing any import letters of credit because there wasn't enough foreign exchange. Nigeria's overpriced oil wasn't selling, so the money wasn't rolling in—in a few weeks, oil revenues dropped from $1.35 billion per month to perhaps $500 million.

But that was just a tremor that will at least force the government to appraise its situation. The frightening scenario is further away, when the oil runs out.

According to World Bank figures, Nigeria's proven oil reserves will last about 15 years at current rates of production. Domestic oil consumption (spurred by cheap gasoline prices) is rising so quickly, however, that in just 10 years there might be no oil left over for export.

That may be a pessimistic prediction, for more oil is being discovered all the time, but by the same token, Nigeria's population of 90 million is growing by 2.5 percent per year and demanding more oil. At some point soon, probably within two of three decades, Nigeria will have no oil to export.

Imagine the trauma then: Some 90 percent of export earnings would disappear, the country would not be able to feed itself and people's soaring expectations would come crashing down to earth. Nigeria's fragile democracy, resting on bitter tribal rivalries, probably could not survive, if any government could.

Meanwhile, the population would continue to grow, placing new strains on agriculture and society. The World Bank estimates that Nigeria's population will eventually level off at 459 million.

The government of President Shehu Shagari has looked into its crystal ball, for it has begun plowing money back into agriculture. Shagari hopes that Nigeria will become self-sufficient in food by 1985, but at present trends Nigeria will actually import twice as much food in 1985 as it does now. In simplest terms, the problem is that demand for food is growing by 3.5 percent per year, while food production is growing at less than 1 percent per year.

Some other African countries—particularly Ivory Coast and Cameroon—recently have joined the ranks of oil exporters but have been very careful to avoid the Nigerian model. They have avoided extravagant spending plans and have stressed the need to base their economies on agriculture, rather than oil. Indeed, the Ivory Coast government hardly admits the country has any oil revenue.

In Nigeria, the dizzying growth may be at an end. Some observers say the country's current crisis of foreign exchange may be a blessing if it forces the government to plan for the future.●

BUDGETING FOR NATIONAL PURPOSES

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have argued that the congressional budget process is flawed to the extent that it lacks a direct and explicit connection with the implementation of national policy goals, both domestic and foreign. Much of the budget debate involves fiscal questions, issues of incremental change in existing programs, and plain numbers. Rarely does the budget serve as a blueprint for the implementation of national goals, that it should. In other words, until we focus on specific policy targets and goals, we will not be in a position to determine what the major priorities are, how they relate to one another, and what it takes to implement them over a period of time.

Marcus Raskin, senior fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, D.C., sheds new light on the goal-setting role of the Federal budget in an introductory paper he wrote for a new institute budget study, that 60 Members of Congress have requested. This study is the second of a series, following publication of the 1978 study entitled, "The Federal Budget and Social Reconstruction." Mr. Raskin's analysis is worthy of our fullest consideration, and follows at this point in the RECORD.

BUDGETING FOR NATIONAL PURPOSES

(By Marcus Raskin)

When Congress legislates it must ask whether a particular program promotes social equity. Does it aid people in achieving individuals dignity? Does the program increase or decrease personal security? Does it accept the principle of decency for all people? If Congress asks such questions it will lead to a budget which recognizes that our most enduring capital is our human resources. Recognition of this single fact would help to erase our horrendous budget deficits. As innumerable studies have shown, demand increases with higher levels of education and when people are working. I would term such a budget a human rights budget; one that can be balanced.

Beginning with our first budget study in 1975, the IPS Budget Group argued the importance of a balanced budget. This view was thought to be heretical, at least among liberal policy analysts and economists. Our argument was that a balanced budget makes it possible to control activities of government which do not have the full support of the citizenry. Had there been prudent public financing in the 1960s it would have been possible for the United States to escape the dire consequences of inflation of the late 1960s and 1970s. Within a decade the congressional and Executive unwillingness to pay for the Viet Nam war through raised taxes turned out to be a national economic disaster. It also perpetuated a "guns and butter" mentality which encouraged legislators to believe that a full scale war could be fought without economic cost.

We are now in an even greater economic disaster. It should be noted that the need for a balanced budget has not changed. The question remains who is to pay for it? Which class? And what will have to be given up? These questions can best be answered in the context of a national needs assessment program which I outline later in the letter. There are, however, immediate steps to debate which could begin to repair the damage in which our leaky ship of state finds itself. Without this direction we will find a chaotic financial and economic situation that will pile one crisis on top of another. The nation will be able to look forward to a decade of unbalanced budgets, a shrinking public sector and even deeper class disparity. These are the issues which should be debated by Congress and the public at large. It is time to—

Develop public enterprises and yardstick industries as the way to get the economy moving again;

Establish an economic bill of rights which would define a decent standard of living for all Americans, and relate all social security and welfare programs to this standard;

Stop the present tax expenditure system from its massive hemorrhaging by cutting into this system and returning to a progressive system of taxation;

Provide for the actual common defense of the United States by presenting a defense budget which clarifies what is for the direct protection and defense of the United States and what is in defense of our allies through alliances; [1]

Have Congress limit the amount of interest and the rate of interest it is prepared to pay when it goes to the capital market for loans;

Enforce export restrictions on commercial banks that do substantial investing of American capital abroad so that more funds would be available for investment within the United States.

The first goal of this type of human rights budget is that of internalizing into the American political economy the principles which are outlined in the economic and social covenants on human rights. These covenants, finally presented to the Senate during the Carter term in 1977, have not been ratified. This is an error in public policy for these covenants make clear that we as a nation are committed to an economic value and law system which establishes the clear primacy of people's welfare.

A human rights policy aimed at the economy would mean that creating and sustaining unemployment could not be used as a way to control inflation. It would mean that other methods would have to be used, even some price controls. It would mean realizing certain stubborn facts of the modern economy; that deficits are increased with unemployment and that, more important, the creativity and inventiveness of a vibrant people is lost. Where a human rights policy is not applied to economic problems we are left with the problem of structural human misery and national depletion. A human rights budget accepts the principle of minimums and maximums in wealth and income. It recognizes that there can be no internal social well being unless people feel that they are citizens of the same nation. A critical element in assuring this sensibility is fairness. It is not expectation of fairness at some future time. It is fairness in the present.

Congress is hamstrung if it is unable to define the terms of the economy through the public sector. It is ironic that government is held responsible for the condition of the economy at a time when most banks, corporations and other large investors insist that government and Congress should play little role in the economy. Congress defeats itself when it does not use the public sector as the major instrument to develop standards of fairness in the economy. It is through government and voluntary associations (the society's agents) that society can stimulate the principle of fairness as an ongoing way of life. It is only through the stimulation of fairness and personal dignity that social envy and anger can be dissipated.

Obviously, the principle of fairness (economic and social justice) requires a reconsideration of what is usually thought to be public as against private. Is it not mistaken as a matter of pragmatic public policy to continue the belief that the giant multinational corporations and banks are part of the private sector without power to frame the existence of most peoples' lives, but towns of five hundred are termed the public sector? It is foolish and dangerous public policy to believe that the federal government with continuous citizen participation has no judgment or need to constrain these giants, no power or rationality to formulate a principle of democratic planning, no power or rationality to develop proposals for long-term participation of workers in the life of their place of work and no power of insight to develop public sector yardstick industries which can show the way to a nation which is in strong need of regeneration.

[1] It is also time to ask what other "interests" are being defended with our defense budget and who is served by the defense of those interests. Is it not clear that diplomatic means need to be a way to cut defense budgets and to build viable international institutions and disarmament arrangements?

It makes no pragmatic sense for American politicians responsible for the common prosperity of the society to genuflect before the "free enterprise" system and the private sector at a time when what is required is huge doses of public participation and public funds to undertake necessary social reconstruction.

Whatever the ideological disposition of a nation there is no escape from the fact that the government and the public sector have an important, often crucial role to play in the long-term development of a nation. But it is also true that democratic governments are crucial to maintain individual freedom and dignity. Personal security, the possibilities of a fulfilled life or a poor life are utterly related to the decisions which are made in Washington. Thus, is it not socially damaging to the nation and personally damaging to individual schoolchildren when we cut federal aid to elementary and secondary education? Is it not obvious that thousands of workers lose heart when they see federal job programs end knowing in the deepest, most personal sense, the realities of the private market, a market where there are no jobs available?

The Democratic Party is not blameless. Should not the Democratic Party and the economist advisors to it be ashamed for not pressing the Humphrey-Hawkins Act into practice? By establishing a national employment agency millions of people would now have a work alternative and the federal government would have recognized in practical terms its responsibility in the productive arena. It is no sign of freedom that our beloved nation lags behind in economic human rights. We have lagged in formulating citizen wages or a full employment system. We have refused to put into the public sector capital funds so that public sector jobs in public enterprises would have a chance of being self-sustaining and income producing. We have not strengthened voluntary nonprofit institutions so they could adequately provide the caring function. Instead, there has been a great deal of interest in both political parties in shamelessly exploiting the language of free enterprise even as small business continues in the grip of a bankruptcy epidemic such as the United States has not seen since its last depression. Our largest banks have forgotten small business. Instead, they have exported monetary capital for high profit yields to the damage of our internal economy. Such lending has pushed interest rates to record highs. Is it not obvious that export controls on American banking investment abroad must be created so that actual interest rates at home will drop and American industry can rebuild itself? It seems clear that this type of control is necessary for the restimulation of small business.

As part of an international corporate strategy we continue to expand our investments abroad on a dangerously large scale, "from 12 billion dollars in 1946 to 224 billion in 1980; direct investments abroad rose from 12 billion in 1950 to an enormous 218 billion dollars in 1980." These numbers are statements of dollars following the military flag. But the problem with this investment level is that it has begun to impoverish our intranational trade system and it has created the perception that the United States as a nation needs to perpetuate high investment levels abroad because they are valuable to the American interest. It may well be that the reverse is true. We are starving our own nation of needed capital investment. Furthermore, is there not something misplaced in terms of our view of national interest when we encourage foreign manufacturers to open plants in the United States as if it makes more sense economically and politically to have Toyota in the United States than a plant owned jointly by the U.S. with auto workers, a local community and other shareholders?

While technical economic changes can be made which would have profound positive effect, we would still not be getting to the question of how people throughout the land could feel and know that things are changing for the better, that they are being heard and that there is a mechanism which can be established that will transform their voices into coherent new legislation for the nation. Congress is the branch of government which has the primary responsibility for taking cognizance and acting independently on the national social and economic crisis. To do so Congress must act in an innovative manner and transcend its own committee system by leaving a legacy, plan, and program for the next Congress. It must sift the ideas, plans, programs, needs and problems of people who are on the edge of desperation.

Under a congressional resolution which designated the Speaker of the House to appoint a select committee as the responsible authority for the activity Congress would hold official hearings in each of the congressional districts in order to prepare a national needs assessment plan for our national emergency. Citizens, with the aid of experts such as "input-output economists", would develop local needs assessment plans. These plans would serve as the building blocks for a national needs assessment program and plan worked out by the select committee. The hearings, town meetings and dialogues which would take place at the local level would ascertain what plans and programs could be generated to begin to solve our most persistent underlying social and economic problems. This national needs assessment plan would begin from the assumption that the federal government has a fundamental role to play in restoring economic and social health to the various regions of the nation.

With such a project Congress would find its own voice, prepare its own plans and programs over the course of the next two years. In each part of the nation there are thousands of people waiting to be heard, to work on a national and local needs assessment program. There are literally thousands of social scientists, natural scientists and humanists who would answer Congress call for specialized aid. There are millions of people in unions, small business groups, church groups and single issue groups who are waiting for congressional leadership. They could be mobilized to hold hearings and meetings with their respective member of Congress as well as the select committee.

While Congress necessarily will continue its battles with the Executive over the next two years, it is highly unlikely that these battles, given the way that they have been defined, will help in laying out the basis for an alternative program which speaks from the citizenry and which has been honed into a condition that it could be seriously considered by Congress over the next several years. A new, comprehensive program could emerge from the national hearings, in all areas of public concern from economic policy, national security, to housing, health, education and citizen participation empowerment issues. It could be analyzed and shaped in Congress and in conjunction with public scholars, as well as special teams of aides, from the Congressional Budget Office, Office of Technical Assessment, General Accounting Office and Legislative Reference Service. But the staffs themselves must be prepared to break out of their economistic-budgetary mold and be open to ideas from all aspects of knowledge, the human and natural sciences as well as ideas from citizens who are not usually heard or seen. By bringing together the needs of people, political acument and statecraft as well as technical understanding, we can help in removing the vise which is now gripping the heart, soul and pocketbook of the nation.

There is a public sector activity which is in need of correction, and which should be considered in the preparation of a national needs assessment plan. I refer of course to the entire national security and defense area. In this critical sector American policymakers have not seriously reinvestigated the assumptions of the American defense budget since the second world war. We have accepted an easy automatic assumption that large defense appropriations increase the security of the U.S. and our allies. Second, we have thought that the price of defense was a "rational" one. That is to say, it related to specific needs and objectives of the whole American nation and that the various weapons systems made economic and strategic sense. Furthermore, Americans believed that defense helped problems of internal employment and production. It was also thought that other nations, such as the western alliance, economically needed our support and that without that support these nations would be in dire military danger. None of these policy assumptions can withstand any kind of rigorous scrutiny. What was once concrete is changing into sand. We now find, as Dr. Herbert York, the first Director of Defense Research at the Pentagon has put it, "a positive causal relationship between spending and insecurity". The technological nuclear arms race, which Eisenhower's science defense advisor attributes to our initiatives at every point, is itself the root of the declining security. Professor Edward Herman has expanded this analysis:

"A constant struggle to keep ahead has kept us ahead, but at the cost of the Soviet Union acquiring the capability of destroying our civilization, steadily widening proliferation, and the escalating race threatening greater accuracy, reduced warning times, more automated response mechanisms, larger stocks of overkill, and greater threats of accident, fear based initiatives, and regional nuclear war."

There is no greater need at this point in American history than that of defining more clearly the national interest. Our nation is being bled by irrational military commitments, passionate attachments to alliances. We have forgotten that alliances are means and ends in themselves. We have forgotten that there are alternative and more effective ways of maintaining the peace than through power bloc military alliances. Is it not time to find ways of turning NATO and the Warsaw Pact Alliance into a joint arms control and inspection system in Europe? Surely this method of security would profoundly alter the costs of maintaining a large American defense establishment in West Europe.

The growth of the national security budget is directly related to an internal political dynamic which includes the weapons laboratories, defense industries, with bureaucratic and congressional allies. The activity of this "iron triangle" as it is called, is the continuous production of new weapons systems, without relevance to cost, utility or a strategy which is defined in terms of limits and proportion. Needless to say, the costs of weapons are secondary concerns.

There is a great deal of self-delusion about the arms race and Soviet behavior. It is clear that American national security policymakers act circumspectly about direct confrontation with what the Soviets perceive as their interests. And while there is a great deal of anger at the Soviets for invading Afghanistan, so far as I know, no one in the Reagan administration has suggested that the U.S. militarily intervene on the side of the guerillas. If this is the case, and if there is not going to be a military "rollback of the Soviet Union" from East Europe, it must be asked why we continue the size force we have committed ourselves to in Europe. If there is a less expensive, and more lasting way of securing the freedom of West Europe, and the possible freedom of East Europe through diplomatic alternatives, why should these not be pursued directly and more vigorously?

From a budgetary point of view, the time is propitious for studying the successes of the cold war period for American diplomatic policy which allowed the U.S. to cut its military budget and which guaranteed freedom and stability to a nation. I speak of the Austrian State treaty which was signed by the great powers including the Soviet Union and the United States.

An analysis of this negotiation coupled with an analysis of the Stassen-Zorin discussions (similar in character to the Nitze-Kvitinsky discussions) yields policy parallels which would help our national security policy. While it is true that only twenty percent of the national security budget is tied to nuclear and strategic weapons, it is the part of the budget which is most obviously detrimental to the American interest.

From time to time it is argued that there is an unfortunate link between the arms race and corporate, bureaucractic needs. Serious consideration should be given to reinstituting an excess defense profits tax with strict profit limits on defense contracts. Furthermore, defense corporations should not pay salaries higher than GS18 for work on defense contracts. Thus, a defense corporation's salary schedule should be geared to the GS scale.

Finally, serious public and congressional consideration should be given to ethical, legal, philosophical and theological debate around war-peace questions being held in non-governmental institutions. The sterile dependence on nuclear armaments or unilateral military interventions as the way to keep peace is being culturally challenged by other potentially sounder and more life affirming possibilities in churches and universities. I hope that Congress will be part of this dialogue so that the national security budget will be linked to our deepest ethical values.●

WOMEN ARE STILL BEING SLIGHTED

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, in recent days the administration has made strident efforts to defend its rapport with the women in this country. At the moment, the question of whether or not a sufficient number of women has been named political appointees seems to be at the center of the storm.

True, there are real discrepancies surrounding this particular issue, but at the same time, are we not overlooking the real underlying problem at work here: the lack of economic equity for women. In all the frantic exchanging of facts and figures, are we not forgetting the average woman who lives and works outside our Nation's Capital, and who receives little or no recognition for her day's work. To these women, who make up the majority, a political appointment is millions of light years away. To these women, a paycheck means more for their survival.

Recent studies by the Bureau of Labor and Statistics show that, despite equal-pay laws, the average female still tends to earn less than her male coworker. Even more alarming are the figures which indicate that women, who hold traditionally female occupations such as teaching, are not receiving the same salary as their male counterparts.

As we well know, discrimination against women simply does not stop at the buck. A recent column by Jane Bryant Quinn further explores the detours women continue to face on the long road to attaining equality and narrowing the gender gap. I would like to take this opportunity to share Ms. Quinn's comments with my fellow colleagues.

[From Newsweek, Sept. 26, 1983]

WOMEN AND THE GENDER GAP

(By Jane Bryant Quinn)

How nice to see so many politicians worried about the gender gap. For years men mockingly asked their dinner partners, "But my dear, what do women want?" Now they're asking that same question with respect. The answer is that they want a fairer share of the nation's economic wealth.

Equal Pay. Despite equal-pay laws, women still tend to earn a lower wage. Demographer Nancy Rytina of the Bureau of Labor Statistics recently compared male and female pay, for full-time work, in 91 occupations. In not one case did the average woman earn as much as the average man. Commonly, she earned 25 to 40 percent less. Even in traditionally female occupations, women lose. Eighty-two percent of the elementary school teachers were women in 1981, but they earned only 82 percent of the average salary paid their male peers.

There's a grab bag of explanations for their lower pay. Some women take time off from work to rear young children; some want to work fewer hours. "But a substantial chunk of the wage gap is simply due to discrimination," Rytina concludes.

Law Enforcement. Despite several lawsuits filed on behalf of women's rights, the administration has been sending strong signals that discriminatory practices won't be leaned on quite so hard as in the past. One nasty fight surrounded a Labor Department proposal—now temporarily stalled—that would have made it tougher for women to win back-pay awards, stepped away from affirmative-action hiring plans and effectively reduced the number of women and minorities companies have to hire in order to keep their government contracts. Businessmen complain about all the paperwork involved in these plans, yet that paperwork would never have fallen upon them had they not kept blacks and women down. Without continuing pressure for numerical goals and timetables, employers will find it easier to slip back into their old habits of thought.

The administration has also reinterpreted Title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments, which threatens institutions with losing their federal funds if they discriminate against women. All previous administrations read this law broadly, which Sen. ROBERT DOLE says was Congress's intent. But the Reaganauts hope to reduce its scope. If they prevail, a school will be able to show bias in some programs, as long as they don't discriminate in the particular area getting federal help. A similar interpretation might be given to dozens of other laws, which would weaken a decade of legal protection offered women.

Child Support. A recent Census Bureau report found that of all the mothers entitled to child support, fewer than half were collecting the full amount for which they were eligible (an average of $40 a week). All the states have programs to try to collect from delinquent fathers, but federal rules have encouraged them to concentrate on welfare cases. Recently—after heavy lobbying by Republican women—Reagan decided to change the program to encourage more states to collect unpaid child support on behalf of the women not on welfare. But at the same time he proposed to cut the federal government's guaranteed share of the program's cost. It's a hollow gesture to offer to help more mothers collect their child support if the money won't be there to do the job.

Poverty Issues. Loss of traditional male support has been throwing women into poverty. One out of every four divorced or separated women is now on welfare. One out of every three female-headed families lives below the poverty line. The poverty rate among older women is nearly twice that of older men. Those opposed to welfare have not yet resolved how to deal with the special need of destitute women. To take a job, for example, a single mother may need day care for her child, yet many public daycare programs have been cut back.

The Equity Bills. After years of trying, Rep. PATRICIA SCHROEDER, a Democrat, and Sen. DAVID DURENBERGER, a Republican, are attracting support for several bills aimed at women's economic concerns. The administration recently testified in favor of proposals to strengthen women's access to pensions. IRA's for housewives are a popular cause (although they'll benefit mainly those women, whose husbands can afford to save an extra $2,000 a year). Some of the economic-equity bills will pass as election season nears and Congress remembers that each year women have been going to the polls at a greater rate. In 1920, organized women finally got the vote; in 1984, they may, for the first time, organize to use it.●

H.R. 3976 CENTRAL BOARD OF SCIENTIFIC RISK ASSESSMENT ACT OF 1983

HON. JAMES G. MARTIN
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as Members may be aware the National Academy of Sciences recently issued an important report on risk assessment entitled "Risk Assessment in the Federal Government: Managing the Process" (1983). That report contained two key findings:

First, within agencies, the risk assessment function should be distinct from and precede the risk management function; and

Second, there is a need for better coordination among Federal agencies on risk assessment, particularly where more than one agency is involved and the issues raised have national significance.

Last week, I and several of our colleagues introduced a bill, H.R. 3976, which addresses those findings and adopts several recommendations in the NAS report. It emphasizes the importance of risk assessments having a sound scientific base, and it creates a science board to increase uniformity in agency risk assessments.

The Central Board of Scientific Risk Assessment Act of 1983, which I have introduced would authorize the establishment of a Board of Scientific Risk Assessment as a means of improving the conducting and coordination, as well as the scientific review and evaluation of Federal agency risk assessments of chronic health hazards. Actual and potential hazards that could affect human life, health, and the environment are of great and growing public concern. The public must have confidence in the adequacy and independence of the scientific basis of Federal regulatory actions. Moreover, public credibility of regulatory decisions will be enhanced if those regulatory decisions are based upon the latest and best science available.

This bill would establish a means of achieving these goals.

The bill authorizes the National Academy of Sciences to establish a Board of Scientific Risk Assessment. The Board would be composed of 15 members who would be appointed by the President of the Academy from nominations selected by the Academy from recommendations submitted to the Academy by organizations of professional scientists, faculties of colleges and universities, heads of Federal and State agencies, and distinguished members of the scientific community. The nominations would be made in accordance with the nominating procedures of the Academy. To be appointed to the Board, a member must be qualified and distinguished by training and experience in life, physical or environmental sciences, including but not limited to biology, biochemistry, biostatistics, epidemiology, comparative metabolism/pharmacokinetics, medicine, veterinary and human pathology, industrial hygiene, and toxicology and have expertise relevant to the assessment of risk.

Members of the Board would serve 3-year terms. To maintain the continuity of the Board, the terms would be staggered. Members of the Board and its subpanels would receive reimbursement for travel expenses incurred in carrying out the duties of the Board, and a modest allowance for each day they are engaged in work on behalf of the Board. The Chairman of the Board would be elected by the Board itself. The Board would also have an Executive Director who would be appointed by the Chairman of the Board and a staff of appropriate size that would be appointed by the Executive Director.

The Board would develop, issue, and periodically revise scientific principles and practices for risk assessments by the Federal agencies. These scientific principles and practices would reflect the current state of the art for the risk assessment process, encourage uniformity in agency assessment of risks and insure the adequacy of the scientific base of such assessments. While the bill does not prescribe the procedures the Board would follow, it is expected the Board will invite expert scientific and other input relevant to risk assessment from outside the Board in the development of these principles.

The Board would also review certain risk assessments made by Federal agencies of chronic health hazards that involve more than one agency and which are determined by any such agency to be of national significance. If the Director of OSTP concurs he would transmit the assessment to the Board for review. My intent here is to provide a limited review function for the Board that would involve a very few cases (perhaps only two to four per year). There is logic in tapping the scientific expertise represented by this Board for those few issues that have national significance and are at the cutting edge of scientific understanding. Correspondingly, however, I am persuaded by the concern expressed in the NAS report that any review function not overburden the Board. Therefore, my bill deliberately limits the risk assessments which can be referred to the Board to those which involve more than one agency and which are also of national significance. This will keep the Board from becoming overloaded and thus insure the availability of the Board's unique scientific resources for those issues that deserve consideration by the best experts available to the Nation.

The Board would also organize scientific workshops, hold symposia, and make recommendations to the Federal agencies on research needed in the risk assessment field.

In carrying out each of these functions, the Board would be required to consult regularly with the Federal agencies which are or may be involved.

Whenever a risk assessment is referred to the Board, the Board would be required to publish a notice of the referral in the Federal Register, along with an invitation for public input relevant to risk assessment. The Board, or one or more subpanels, would expeditiously review the risk assessment, taking into account the latest available scientific data relevant to the risk assessment.

Upon completion of its review, the Board would submit to the appropriate agencies a written report. The report would include the Board's evaluation of the agency risk assessment together with a discussion of whether the agencies' assessment of risk is consistent with the available relevant scientific learning. The report shall be submitted to the appropriate agencies as expeditiously as possible and would also be made publicly available.

The Board would be authorized to establish subpanels to review agency risk assessments. A notice would be placed in the Federal Register of the Board's intent to appoint a subpanel. Each subpanel would have at least six members, at least two of whom are members of the Board. The remaining members would be scientific experts in the field or fields involved in the particular risk assessment to be reviewed. This composition would enhance consistency among the subpanels while allowing greater relevant expertise in reviewing a risk assessment. All subpanel members would be appointed by the chairman of the Board. Non-Board members would be appointed from among nominations submitted by the Academy. The nominations process for subpanel members would be similar to that for Board members.

After completing its review of any risk assessment, the subpanel would submit to the Board a written report on the risk assessment. The Subpanel's report would contain the same assessments and discussions required for Board reports. The Board would be required to review the subpanel's report on an expedited basis, and thereafter the report, with or without modification by the Board, would become the report of the Board.

The Board would be required to maintain the confidentiality of trade secrets and of privileged or confidential commercial information that may be involved in reviewing an agency risk assessment or in any of the Board's other functions. Board members and subpanel members would be subject to the Academy's conflict of interest disclosure requirements and would be screened by the Academy for any potential conflicts prior to appointment. The Board would have authority to enter into such contracts and to take such other actions, including prescribing regulations for the operation of the Board, as may be necessary or appropriate.

The bill also contains a 5-year sunset provision. Congressional action would be required to extend the life of the Board, thus preventing its perpetual existence and ensuring a complete evaluation of the experience and appropriateness of the Board and the opportunity to study modifications and improvements.

Passage of this bill would encourage uniformity in the Federal Government's approach to risk assessment and would help ensure the adequacy of the scientific basis for risk assessments that involve issues of national significance. At the same time the Board's role would be strictly scientific and advisory in character and would not intrude or infringe upon the decisionmaking functions of the Federal agencies.●

SENATOR JOHN L. MADURO'S ACCOMPLISHMENTS SHOULD INSPIRE YOUNG VIRGIN ISLANDERS

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, like many of us in this House, I learned the legislative process in my local legislature.

Those on the other side of the aisle will appreciate that my legislative skills were fine tuned by my membership in the minority caucus of that body. As minority leader of a nearly evenly divided chamber, I was compelled to be constantly on my toes to try and counter the seemingly neverending efforts of the majority to impose their legislative will.

As Members here will also appreciate, those perpetual challenges developed close alliances. And deeper than the partisan alliances they forged were personal alliances—that crossed sides of the floor.

These personal alliances were attributable to the respect that is created for a political opponent of good will and ability.

Such an opponent was Senator John L. Maduro.

Since he was a leader of the majority during much of my service in the Virgin Islands Legislature, John and I were most often at odds in legislative debates. But because he was so dedicated and capable, I have always cherished John's friendship and had the greatest respect for him.

When the divided factions of the Democratic Party of the Virgin Islands merged 15 years ago, John and I formally became allies. We worked even more closely after that unification as John became president of the legislature and I was elected to represent our people in Washington.

That experience of mutual leadership strengthened our friendship and deepened my respect for John.

One of the only disappointments of my return to this House after the election of 1980 was that John's service to our people in the legislature was ending.

During more than two decades of leadership of our islands, John held virtually every position of importance in the legislature, helped advance the progressive position on virtually every issue, and assumed many personal sacrifices as he did so.

The people of the Virgin Islands—and particularly those of John's home island of St. Thomas—owe a great debt to this man. Their lives are certainly and significantly better for the laws for which he was responsible.

At a recent Democratic Party dinner in his honor, Senator John L. Maduro's career was well described by the great former Governor of our territory, Ralph M. Paiewonsky. I wish to have those remarks placed in the RECORD after this statement. By doing so I hope both to enlighten my colleagues as to John's many achievements and to inspire young Virgin Islanders to appreciate and, hopefully, follow the example of John L. Maduro.

The remarks follow:

Attorney John Lawrence Maduro is a native of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands. He is a product of the local public school system and a graduate of the Charlotte Amalie High School. By his determination and hard work he earned his bachelor's degree from New York University School of Education and his law degree from George Washington University School of Law in Washington, D.C.

He is a member of the Virgin Islands Bar Association and the American Bar Association, with all the rights and privileges. He is admitted to practice before the courts of the Virgin Islands, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and the U.S. Supreme Court.

He was not content to claim special privilege because he was born in the Virgin Islands. He earned this right by diligently pursuing higher education and working hard to acquire the necessary skills to qualify him to meet and successfully compete in the outside real world.

During World War II he served in the U.S. Army in the North African and European theaters of war, and achieved the rank of master sergeant and later the rank of second lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserves.

Upon his return to St. Thomas in 1955 he became active in politics. First as a member of the Unity Party, which later became the liberal wing of the Democratic Party of the Virgin Islands. He was always in the forefront of the struggle for the political, economic and social advancement of the Virgin Islands.

Many of the political rights which Virgin Islanders take for granted today, such as: the elected Governor; elected Delegate to Congress; the power of the legislature to apportion its seats in accordance with the one-man, one-vote rule, to fix the compensation of its members and to override gubernatorial vetoes with finality, were all achieved with the help of Senator John Maduro and his fellow Democratic Senators.

In 1958 Attorney Maduro was elected to the Virgin Islands legislature and went on to serve eleven consecutive terms, 1959 to 1981. As a member of the Senate, Maduro held several important posts. He served as President of the Virgin Islands Senate from 1969 to 1973, and served as Chairman of the Standing Committees on the Judiciary, Commerce, Education, Finance and Rules; also Legislative Secretary, Senate Vice President, and for a period of ten years, 1971–1981, he presented a weekly political radio broadcast known as "The Maduro Report," which had a wide listening audience. It should also be noted here that Senator Maduro was an active partner in the law firm of Birch, deJongh & Farrelly.

During his twenty-two years of service in the Senate, John L. Maduro was constantly involved in the struggle to improve the social, economic and political conditions of his homeland. During the years when I was Governor of the Virgin Islands, Senator Maduro together with another outstanding Virgin Islander, Senator Earle B. Ottley, and the democratic controlled V.I. Legislature, established a partnership for progress which resulted in bringing the V.I. into the mainstream of social, economic and political advancement and definitely out of the "poor house" state of the earlier past. Senator Maduro was a staunch supporter of all the progressive legislation that made the difference. His loyalty was never questioned. Whenever he gave his word it was kept, and for this he gained the respect of his associates. It should be noted here that there is a big difference between being respected and being popular, a choice that most elected officials face during their tenure in office. It is highly desirable to be both, but if a choice must be made it is far better to be respected. For it is possible to be popular without being respected, and it is equally possible to be respected even though unpopular. Respect is hard-earned and consequently more lasting.

Senator Maduro was not satisfied nor contented with the old image of having a community of people, smugly secure at the top and with little hope at the bottom, where the vast majority are deprived of the basic means for advancement. He was determined to create a Virgin Islands that would offer unlimited opportunities to its citizens in all areas of social, political and economic endeavor, and a Virgin Islands where pride is one's heritage and homeland would be everlasting. Therefore, with a democratic majority in the legislature and a sympathic democratic governor in government house, a new day dawned in the Virgin Islands.

In closing let me again congratulate Senator John L. Maduro for his years of service to the people of the Virgin Islands, and wish him continued success in all his undertakings.●

NATIONAL SCIENCE BOARD COMMISSION PRESENTS PLAN TO IMPROVE THE NATION'S PRECOLLEGE MATH AND SCIENCE EDUCATION

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, the National Science Board Commission on Precollege Education in Mathematics, Science, and Technology has just released a report which, I believe, does an excellent job of looking at the Nation's critical mathematics and science education problems and outlining a plan for major improvements to solve these problems.

One of a number of recent reports which call attention to the crisis we face in science and math education, the Commission report goes further, suggesting a broad plan for improvements in the educational system and a target date of the year 1995 for accomplishing such improvements. The report also sets out costs to the Federal Government to carry out the suggested initiatives.

In the Committee on Science and Technology we have been working, both under the committee's legislative and oversight responsibilities in connection with the National Science Foundation and through cooperative legislative initiatives, to address some aspects of the broader issue. An example is H.R. 1310, a bill to improve math, science, and engineering education and teacher training. This legislation was acted on jointly by the committee on Science and Technology and the Committee on Education and Labor and has been passed by the House of Representatives. Clearly, the Commission's delayed study will be helpful to our ongoing efforts to address problems of U.S. science and math education.

The report is entitled "Educating Americans for the 21st Century: A Plan of Action for Improving Mathematics, Science, and Technology Education for all American Elementary and Secondary Students So That Their Achievement Is the Best in the World by 1995," and I should like to bring to my colleagues' attention some of its major highlights and recommendations, stated in the National Science Foundation press release announcing the report:

MAJOR HIGHLIGHTS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE REPORT

Initial Federal investment of $1.51 billion, to improve mathematics, science and technology education in the elementary and secondary schools . . . disbursed at a rate of $956 million per year for the first three years, $680 million per year for the next two years, and $331 million per year thereafter.

Retraining and upgrading of the 1.16 million elementary and secondary school teachers who presently are less than fully qualified to teach these subjects. The total cost for such retraining is estimated at $3.49 billion. The Commission determined that the Federal share should be 50 percent and that this retraining should be done over a period of five years. Thus, the cost per year to the Federal government would be $349 million.

Establishment of 1,000 elementary and 1,000 secondary exemplary schools and programs throughout the nation, to serve as "landmarks of excellence." There are some such exemplary schools already in existence in communities throughout the United States. Examples are provided in Exhibit A. The Commission estimates that the cost to establish an exemplary secondary school for mathematics, science and technology is $750,000 and the cost to establish an exemplary elementary school is $525,000. The Commission felt these schools should be established over a three-year time period and that the Federal share should be 65 percent. Thus the Federal government would be called upon to disburse a total of $829 million over that period (or $276 million per year).

Formulation of a set of "new basics" to establish a new standard of scientific and technological literacy, and a more coherent pattern of K-12 math and science education.

A strong commitment of National resources to teaching these subjects to all students, not just the gifted and talented.

Substantially increased time devoted to these academic subjects, through increases in the school day, week or year, as well as through increased discipline in the classroom.

Increased time for mathematics and science in elementary school: 60 minutes per day for math, 30 minutes per day for science . . . a full year of math and science in grades 7 and 8.

Increased requirements for high school graduation: 3 years of high school mathematics, including 1 year of algebra, and 3 years of science and technology, including one semester of computer science.

Increased requirements for college admission: 4 years of high school science, including physics, chemistry and 1 year of computer science, and 4 years of mathematics, including a second year of algebra and coursework covering probability and statistics.

OTHER HIGHLIGHTS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The appointment by the President of a National Education Council to oversee the Commission's plan of action and to measure America's progress in attaining the world's finest system of education by 1995.

Establishment of Governors' Councils in each State to stimulate change, develop state education goals and monitor progress.

Establishment of a national mechanism for measuring student achievement and participation, that will allow national, State, and local evaluation and comparison of educational progress.

Reaffirms the national consensus that States and localities should shoulder most of the responsibility and cost of public education . . . yet recognizes a strong national interest and Federal role in rejuvenating math and science education.

Supports rigorous standards for certifying mathematics and science teachers; together with improved training, recognition and appropriate compensation. Exhibit D contains some imaginative ways to increase teachers' compensation.

Encourages increased use of computers and other modern education technologies for student instruction, teacher training and classroom management.

Encourages increased informal education, including Federal support for out-of-school education and activities by science museums and public broadcasting.

Suggests that commercial broadcast stations, as their public duty, should provide one hour each afternoon for children's educational programs.

Recommends appointment of a Council on Educational Financing to determine costs of educational improvements and methods to raise the needed funds. One suggestion offered to the Council is to develop mechanism to avoid placing individual states under anti-competitive tax disadvantages.●

LOUIS GOLDSTEIN TRIBUTE

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, this week the Mental Health Association of Maryland will convene a banquet in tribute to a gentleman who has become, during his 45 years of public service, the embodiment of civic duty and the pater familias of my State's Democratic Party.

The Honorable Louis Goldstein began his career in public service back in 1937, during Albert C. Ritchie's final year as Governor. For the next 5 years he served in the house of delegates. Elected to the State senate by the people of Calvert County in 1947, he served as majority floor leader from 1951 to 1955, and as president of the senate from 1955 to 1958. In that year Louis Golstein was raised to the office of comptroller of the State of Maryland, a position combining all the pleasures of tax collecting with the many rewards of budget planning. The thankless decisions demanded of a comptroller have never before won the holder of that office the respect which Louis Goldstein has earned. He has presided over that office for the last 25 years. With greater predictability than the tides, the people of Maryland have reelected him, and this is a tradition I am sure they will continue. In the process, they have given to anyone who hears the calling of public service a role model that can be emulated, but never equalled.

One facet of Louis' career seems is as significant as it is unique. That is that public service means much more than simply winning elections or lending support to another candidate's campaign. Public service means total dedication to the job at hand. In this respect, Louis is an undisputed and widely recognized expert in organizing and managing State finances. So widely is this appreciated that just last week the Governor announced what I believe to be an unprecedented tribute in my State: The new State treasury building will soon be dedicated in the name of Louis B. Goldstein. Few public servants have ever been so honored, nor so deserving as this remarkable comptroller.

Louis' career illustrates, however, that statesmanship goes beyond the mere duties of one's office. It also, and perhaps most importantly, means a dedication that takes one into all aspects of one's community: its schools, towns, and youth; its history and its future.

Louis is a gentleman farmer, but knows the crops, soils, and seasons as only a yeoman can. He is a scholar, with many honorary degrees, and knows the history and folklore of Maryland as one can only after having participated in their making for as long as he has. For 10 years he published the Calvert County Gazette, and his keen insight and country wit bound together the farms and villages of southern Maryland.

And he has been soldier as well as statesman. The only 4 years Louis has been absent from Maryland he served on the staff of Gen. Douglas MacArthur.

Having enlisted in the Marine Corps at the mature age of 29, he was rapidly promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and discharged after 4 years in the Pacific and Asian theaters.

Louis Goldstein, in short, is an inspiration to any young person wishing to enter politics. Further, he is a measuring rod of integrity for anyone already involved in public affairs. He is justifiably known as Mr. Maryland. I will take great pleasure in being with him this week at the Mental Health Association's banquet in his honor, and congratulate him on the recognition he so justly has earned in his work as the comptroller of Maryland.●

INDUSTRIAL POLICY: AN IDEA IN SEARCH OF A DEFINITION

HON. DOUGLAS K. BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, more than the fate of the yacht, Liberty, or the pennant race in the National League East, a key topic now being discussed in this city is that vague concept, industrial policy.

Recently, the New York Times and the Christian Science Monitor made some thoughtful comments about our national preoccupation with the industrial policy debate. I hope that all of my colleagues will read the following editorials and then give a more careful look at our Nation's latest policy fad.

The editorials follow:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 1, 1983]

INDUSTRIAL POLICY. WHAT?

All the Democratic Presidential aspirants are for it. President Reagan has just appointed a commission to look into it. Industrial policy: Sounds important. What is it?

So far, it's an idea in search of definition. Until defined, it's just a slogan.

In its barest essentials, industrial policy means a coordinated Federal strategy to reinvigorate the economy. The aim is to revitalize struggling old industries and promote promising new ones, create jobs and, not incidentally, win elections.

Interest in industrial policy was given new impetus by the recent recession, as well as the stunning success of Japanese industry in this country. Clearly, the American economy has lost some of its edge. Heavy "smokestack" industries are being bested by foreign competition. Generally, even complete recovery from the recession is not likely to cut unemployment below 6 percent. If Reaganomics can't solve these problems, then what's the alternative?

The answer, in more than two dozen bills introduced in Congress this year (mostly by Democrats), is some kind of industrial policy mechanism. All the proposals would create a Federal body—some with business and labor membership—to assert national industrial priorities. The most extreme plans would also give the new agency billions of dollars with which to assist specific industries—and the power to dictate to them.

What a temptation these various plans offer: a master plan to make things right. But what a risk, too. For one thing, master planning of a peacetime economy contradicts the American tradition of unfettered competition—in reality often overridden, but a fundamental faith nonetheless.

Can any Federal agency improve on the wisdom and flexibility of the vast complex of the American economy?

It's not as though industrial policies elsewhere have been so uniformly successful. Even Japan, everyone's model, has reversed course on occasion. Its planners forced development of an aluminum industry and now they're forcing it to cut back. In Western Europe, by far the most productive country is West Germany, which has the least centralized economic control—though more so than the United States.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Sept. 16, 1983]

EMERGENCY INDUSTRIAL POLICY

There was a time, only a year or so ago, when political leaders, economists, and some business officials, were asking whether the United States should adopt a national industrial policy to spur economic growth. The question is still asked. But now that the economy continues to improve and promises to be a major factor in next year's presidential election, the nature of the debate has changed.

Increasingly asked is not just whether the US should have an industrial policy but, rather, to what extent the various elements of a national industrial policy that are already taking shape should be centralized into a cohesive, intelligent plan for continued and vigorous economic growth.

The policy now evolving is not that of a centralized support for key US industries, as advocated by many Democrats. What is emerging is an ad hoc policy that deals with specific issues. These include steps to boost overseas trade (such as ending the Soviet grain and European pipeline embargoes); imposing import quotas to aid steel and autos; job retraining; urging, as the Reagan administration did this week, that antitrust laws be relaxed to assist funding for research and development; and enacting personal and business tax cuts to stimulate savings.

It is precisely because such an ad hoc policy is emerging from the demands of the economy that Washington officials must think through the long-range implications of the changes now under way. For Congress and the White House to hammer out a hodgepodge of self-conflicting laws would be unwise.

As Harvard professor Robert Reich recently noted, the issue is not whether the U.S. should have an industrial policy, but "how coherent it will be."

What minimal steps would an industrial policy include—and not include? First the dubious proposals:

As recognized by some economists at a recent conference sponsored by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, the U.S. should avoid aiding specific industries. That means not establishing a multibillion-dollar national development bank. The old Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which some see as a model, was eventually phased out because of allegations of political favoritism. Wall Street investors have a hard enough time picking corporate "winners." There is no reason to think Uncle Sam could do a better job.

Another questionable element of such a policy would be a national "superagency" along the lines of Japan's powerful Ministry of International Trade and Industry.

Now what makes sense:

Change tax and antitrust laws to direct added dollars into research and development. The dollars could come from the federal government as well as from private industry.

Federal statistical agencies, such as the Commerce Department, need to provide more timely information about the economy.

Congress, the White House, and the Federal Reserve should strike a better balance between fiscal and monetary policies to ensure reaching the goals of high employment and price stability. Lurching from inflation fighting to fighting joblessness, and then back again, as has been the case with government in recent years, has hardly helped long-term economic stability.

The federal government should be doing more to aid financially strapped businesses with job training and retraining programs.

A new cabinet-level trade department, already proposed in Congress, should be created. An expanding, global, free trade is vital.

Presidential candidates will all want to take a position on a US industrial policy. That should bring the issue before the public in a healthy debate. Such a debate is necessary now that many of the elements of a new industrial policy are already emerging.●

CHILDREN'S FEARS OF WAR

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, last week the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families held a hearing on the subject of children and the fear of war, especially nuclear war.

The committee had the opportunity to hear directly from some children who very articulately expressed their own fears and urged us to listen to their pleas for a world free from the nuclear threat. I was particularly impressed by a young man from Brooklyn, Gerald Orjuela.

Gerald's testimony before the committee was an excellent presentation, and his ability to handle the questions of committee members was equally impressive.

I would like to share with my colleagues the text of Gerald's prepared statement, and I urge them to heed Gerald's plea.

The testimony follows:

Good morning, parents and distinguished representatives of the United States. Before I begin I would like to say how honored I am for you to let me present my material to you.

I assume you are all sensible people, since it requires great intelligence to be elected to a highly important part of our nation. Other nations have their intelligent people. I'm sure Yuri Andropov is intelligent. Ronald Reagan, our president, is intelligent.

But why instead of using our intelligence for good uses, like peace, we use our intelligence for war? Is it right to call having missiles in Europe peace? Is it right to call a nuclear missile "peace keeper"?

This, is a waste of intelligence. We are criminalizing Newton, Dalton, Einstein, Lucretius, and Democritus, great pioneers in the energy of the Atom. What would Einstein have thought of this?

It is senseless to waste money on a missile. There are no winners in nuclear war. A one megaton weapon exploding at ground level during a nuclear war in Racine, Wisconsin, would have a radioactive cloud reach New York in a week. But by then, New York would have been vaporized long before Racine was.

Why can't we live in a world with only one rule—peace? Sometime in October of last year, I saw a PBS (channel 13) presentation of a movie made by the Japanese after the bomb had hit. Parts of people literally melted under the blast. A bone was sticking out from the socket where there once was an arm. The shadows of people left imprinted on the floors and walls when the heat flash vaporized them. Pitiful piles of entrails that were once known as human beings. That was a 25 kiloton bomb.

Now nations have arsenals made of more than 15,000 warheads mostly thermonuclear. Each one 50 times more powerful than the one over Hiroshima.

Simple in design. At high temperatures, the two forms of "heavy" hydrogen, deuterium, and tritium fuse to form the heavier element helium. Great energy is released. That can be heard in any serene junior high school. But no matter how simple it is, it's deadly. Any country with the capabilities can do it. And so a lot of countries have it. That is frightening.

That is when children, like me, come in. We are frightened that a lot of countries have the bomb. We are frightened that we might be hit. You are parents. Let your children live, and let our children live. If you kill a child, you really kill two—us as children, and us as adults with children. We must understand that anything nuclear—a plant, a missile—a war—is something very dangerous, we cannot yet safely operate the first. We cannot control the second and no one will win the third.

A nuclear war is a time bomb. Time is running out. Let the adults, children and the nations of the world fight and work together to defuse this time bomb. The wire that we need to cut is visible. But to cut the wire we need clippers. If we work together the clippers are in our hands. If not, time will terminate-and so will the world.

If you don't listen to the adults, please in behalf of the children of the world, I beg you, give yourselves and us a chance.

Thank you.●

GOV. RALPH PAIEWONSKY ARTICULATES PARTY LEADERSHIP

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, if we are fortunate, those of us in public life may have the opportunity to know and work with a truly great leader.

I have had that fortune. In my case the individual is a man who has had the vision to know how things should be changed and the ability to bring worthwhile change about.

That man, former Governor Ralph M. Paiewonsky, of my home Virgin Islands, has contributed his vision and ability to our territory for nearly a half century. It is remarkable that despite this long experience—or perhaps because of it—he is still among the most visionary and able leaders of our islands.

This was clearly demonstrated this summer when Governor Paiewonsky addressed a Democractic Party gathering. He used the occasion to articulate the purposes of party leadership of our society in a way that has relevance to all of us—Democrat or not in affiliation.

Because I believe that Governor Paiewonsky's brilliant statement will help all who are exposed to it better understand the political process, I would like to have it included in the RECORD at this point.

The purpose of well-organized, active political parties is to develop among its members the political philosophy and to teach the science of government, to discuss the issues and the needs of the community, develop programs, find solutions, bring about responsibility and accountability in government, to develop political leadership and to participate in the process of electing officials to office.

In the past a well-organized, active, responsible Democratic Party with able and dedicated leadership aided in bringing about change in the Virgin Islands. Quite simply, it has been through the growing political maturity of the people of these islands that brought about the changes for the better that we enjoyed in the 1960's. The leaders who represented us in our legislature during those important years, for example, were reflections of those who placed them there. Today our people have access to even better education facilities and opportunities here in the Virgin Islands. Therefore, there should be no lack of intelligent leadership. However, at the present time there seems to be a lot of time wasted in the legislature on matters of minor significance. It is time to put aside petty differences and to discuss the issues in an intelligent manner and find solutions. Again let me repeat that it is the political parties, the Democratic Party, the Republican Party and the Independent Party, that bring about responsibility in government and develop political leadership.

The short-sighted policies of past administrations prior to the 1960's which kept these islands chained to poverty and deprivation affected the rich and poor alike. The well-to-do who embraced those policies hardly realized that they themselves were the victims of their very own old system. They too were liberated and prospered under the new progressive programs. This is a very good example of the kind of prosperity that comes from a broad base, which created a large middle class, and not the trickle-down kind of the earlier past.

Some people criticized the prosperity of the 1960's, claiming that many of the present problems were the result of doing too much in too short a period of time. My answer has always been that it is a poor excuse for their inability to remove garbage, provide more electricity and water, fix roads, and provide more efficient services. It is easer to resolve the problems arising out of prosperity than those arising out of poverty.

Yes, we have progressed—but do not take it for granted that progress and prosperity will continue. It is like freedom. To be free you must keep working at it. The same is true for progress and prosperity.

Today our economy has deteriorated, creating fiscal problems and unemployment. Some of this is caused by outside forces beyond our control and some of it is from a lack of understanding and lack of cooperation between the various groups here in the Virgin Islands. Let me say here, and it cannot be overemphasized, that progress and prosperity will endure only when all Virgin Islands groups put aside their differences in the spirit of cooperation and work together.

Let me repeat what I said sixteen years ago, to be specific on the evening of February 24, 1967, at a St. Croix democratic testimonial dinner I said then and I am saying it again: "Our party of leadership is the party that faces a future of responsibilities on behalf of all Virgin Islanders regardless of their political affiliations. You represent the leadership in government, business and civic endeavors, and you will be called upon to take up the banner and record with deeds that match your words of promise."

Twenty-two years ago when I took office I made a pledge in my inaugural address—expressing the promises of a democratic administration. Here is what I said:

1. We must aim to make our domestic island life a more abundant one.

2. We must accelerate our economy.

3. We must further advance our cultural, moral and spiritual life.

4. We must make greater progress politically.

5. As a practical man, I know that none of us lives on inspiration alone, or on ideals alone. There must be food to eat. There must be a roof over our heads. There must be proper medical aid for the aged and the needy. Accordingly, I will prepare a series of special programs to help achieve these objectives.

6. This administration will also help to expand and develop our tourist economy on a year-round basis instead of a few months only. We also need to diversify our economy. We will encourage the establishment of small industry to create job opportunities on a year-round basis.

7. On the cultural side we must continue to improve the quality of our education.

8. We also need a college in our islands to supply to our people the benefits of higher education, not only to help the individual but also to carry out our part in the national responsiblity to improve our leadership through better trained minds.

9. I can envisage the Virgin Islands as a cultural center for the Caribbean and the Americas, where the culture of all the Americas may meet and profit from the meeting—a university where our friends from the British Virgin Islands will meet our friends from the French Islands, the Dutch Islands, and the Spanish-speaking lands of the Caribbean, the North and the South. This is not merely a dream of mine. It is a project under serious consideration in Washington.

10. On the political side, I will move strongly, as previously stated, for increased representation in our Government. We have three basic aims:

A. We must have representation before the Congress in the form of a delegate freely elected by our people.

B. We must, in the future, elect our own Governor.

C. We must finally achieve the long-desired right to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

I pledge to you here today that I will work unceasingly to gain these goals. We must achieve these things because they are basic rights of all American citizens.

This is what the democratic administration promised you twenty-two years ago. Today we can now look back and see how well our deeds matched our promises. Let us as an active Democratic Party take the leadership role and plan the programs for the future. Our party did it once and it can do it again.

Let us look ahead with renewed hope towards the future. Let a new day dawn, and let that day be tomorrow, and remember, tomorrow is but another dawn away.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY AND AMORTIZATION OF ST. MARY'S CHURCH MORTGAGE, WILKES-BARRE, PENNSYLVANIA

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday evening, October 15, the parishioners of St. Mary's Antiochian Orthodox Church will celebrate the 75th anniversary of their parish and the amortization of their church's mortgage.

The founding fathers of St. Mary's began their immigration to America in the year 1890. The families of Saba, Hyder, Broody, Audi, Simon, Serhan, and Atiyeh hailed from the area of the mountains of Lebanon, above Tripoli. The Syrian Orthodox families of Betar, Abraham, Johns, Cross, Namey, Baroody, and Solomon were among the earliest to arrive from the area of Latakia before 1900.

The young men came alone and found work here under sponsorship of Protestant missionaries in the Middle East. Once these single men earned enough to set up homes, they returned to their homeland to marry and raise children in America. They sought religious freedom and free enterprise in the land of hope and promise. Several of the young men married American women of Irish and Dutch descent and made happy marriages.

By the year 1904, 35 families resided in the Rolling Mill Hill section of Wilkes-Barre, and they convened to organize a parish. A worthy householder, Michael Saba, was elected to be the new clergyman. A bishop from Christian Russia, Raphael of Blessed Memory, came from New York City and ordained the priest. Father Michael served the parish for 4 years. By the year 1908, 30 new families joined the parish, and a new priest, Father George Kattouf, led ably in the purchase of land at 132 High Street in Wilkes-Barre, and the church building was completed at a cost of $9,000.

A rectory was also built in 1912, behind the church, at 19 McCarragher Street for $4,000.

The congregation grew steadily until 1914, when the first World War began. A number of our young men joined the Army and served well. By the year 1928, the old church was enlarged and lifted to build a large community hall underneath, at a cost of $13,000. The congregation, by 1940, was 300 families strong, and boasted business and professional people. During World War II, 130 of its young men served in the Armed Forces and seven lost their lives in the European theater.

In 1958, the congregation voted to erect a new church edifice, hall and rectory. This was done in the year 1969, located at 905 South Main Street, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., at a cost of $800,000. The parish has been active in all civic activities.

Over the years, 534 marriages and 2,156 baptisms have been performed in the buildings of St. Mary's Antiochian Orthodox Church.

And so, Mr. Speaker, October 15 is indeed a very special day for the Wilkes-Barre community. At a banquet that evening all of us will rejoice with the Very Rev. Herbert G. Nahas, the pastor, and all of the people of St. Mary's Antiochian Orthodox Church. It will be my honor to be there, Mr. Speaker, and it is my pleasure today to share this significant moment in the history of the Wyoming Valley with my friends and colleagues in the House.●

JOHN KLEPP, OF BOYDS, MD., RECEIVES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR VALOR CITATION

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, on September 20, 1983, the U.S. Department of the Interior held its 49th Honors Awards Convocation. On that day, the Department honored their employees who care deeply about their fellowman and about America. Three categories of awards were presented at this convocation for individual employees including: Distinguished service, valor, and conservation service.

I am proud that one of my constituents, John W. Klepp, of Boyds, Md., received one of the valor awards. The valor award is presented to those who have demonstrated unusual courage involving a high degree of personal risk in the face of danger. Recipients receive a citation signed by the Secretary and an engraved valor award gold medal.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I include the citation.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington.

CITATION FOR VALOR

JOHN P. FARRELL, JOHN W. KLEPP,
FRANK HART, CALVIN D. YATES

In recognition of courageous action in rescuing four persons from drowning.

On September 16, 1981, an automobile skidded out of control on Beach Drive, Rock Creek Park, and plunged into the raging torrent of the flood-swollen creek. The four occupants escaped from the vehicle and clung to it before it became submerged 25 feet from shore. National Park Service tree crew employees John Klepp, Frank Hart, and Calvin Yates, working nearby, hurried to assist the panic-stricken victims, among them an 82-year-old man. John Klepp and Calvin Yates attempted to swim to the vehicle but were washed downstream by the force of the water. Then John Klepp and Frank Hart entered the water and formed a human chain with the rest of the crew. They reached the victims and held them above the water until additional help arrived. U.S. Park Police Officer John P. Farrell responding to the emergency, observed the rescue attempt and the serious threat of the swift current. He dove into the water, reached the elderly victim, and brought him safely to shore although they were repeatedly submerged in the deep, turbulent water. In a renewed rescue attempt, John Klepp entered the water upstream and swam to the vehicle to secure a rope to the door while the tree crew held the other end. Frank Hart and Officer Farrell swam to the vehicle clinging to the rope and brought the remaining victims one by one to safety. The persons involved in this rescue demonstrated exceptional courage with complete disregard for their personal safety. In recognition of their heroic actions, John P. Farrell, John W. Klepp, Frank Hart, and Calvin D. Yates are granted the Valor Award of the Department of the Interior.

JAMES G. WATT,

H.R. 1510

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the ongoing debate over the pending immigration bill, H.R. 1510, has brought a large volume of mail into my office from constituents and others who are concerned about the likely consequences of enacting this legislation. Many of these expressions of concern come from members of the Hispanic community, whose comments I give particular weight in light of the fact that it is this segment of the population that would be affected the most. While the appeal of granting legal status to the 3 to 6 milion illegal aliens estimated to be living in the United States is a strong argument in favor of passing H.R. 1510, the prospect of widespread discrimination, as described by those who would be its victims, turns this argument around. Even the protections offered by the House Education and Labor Committee's amendments, which I support, can only deal with that problem after the fact.

Another concern of mine relates to provisions in H.R. 1510 that will make it easier for agricultural employers to hire foreign guest workers instead of domestic workers. This would seriously undercut efforts in certain States to organize farm laborers to improve miserable working conditions and substandard wages.

I direct my colleagues' attention to the following letters from leaders of the Hispanic and religious communities in southern California. These letters were accompanied by thousands more letters opposing the bill from religious leaders, local pastors, civic and labor representatives, public agency directors, and local residents, both legal and undocumented. Their message is a vital contribution to the debate on this issue.

SEPTEMBER 20, 1983.

Hon. HOWARD BERMAN,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BERMAN: Once again we are walking the halls of the Capitol sent by important constituencies of the Hispanic community and additionally religious, civil, and labor sectors to impress upon you our many concerns regarding the specter of passage of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill, House version.

Recently, public hearings were held in Los Angeles and Orange Counties, sponsored by the League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC), and many prominent and representative organizations, to hear testimony of the present consequences of this national immigration legislation.

Our country has not the luxury of experimenting with such legislation. Those most affected by this legislation, those who will be impacted the greatest—the Hispanic, Black, and other minority and worker communities—certainly don't have the luxury of experimenting with capricious treatment of their civil rights, economic status, and general social well being. These communities don't have to wait for this legislation to pass to ascertain the impact—good or bad—on their lives. They already know for they are feeling it today.

Testimonies received during those hearings by religious leaders, local pastors, civic and labor representatives, public agency directors, local community residents—citizens residents, and undocumented; clearly bear out our position that Simpson-Mazzoli legislation has no place in our society.

We implore you to listen closely to these constituencies to bear in mind their arguments, to respect their opinions regarding the deteriorating quality of life due to the mere specter of this legislation's passage.

We have brought literally thousands of letters from these constituencies firmly in opposition to the bill.

The national office of LULAC is facilitating our contact with your good office for the purpose of gaining your cooperation in this matter. Specifically, we would like you to make available these thousands of letters to such important congressional leaders as the Honorable Speaker of the House Thomas "Tip" O'Neill and the House Rules Committee Chairman Claude Pepper.

We appreciate your timely cooperation in this matter

Respectively,

BERT CORONA,

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE DIOCESE OF LOS ANGELES,
Los Angeles, Calif., September 16, 1983.

Representative THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: We, the undersigned religious leaders in the Los Angeles area, convened by Cannon Oliver Garver of the Episcopal Diocese of Los Angeles, are deeply opposed to the possible enactment of the Simpson/Mazzoli Immigration and Reform Act of 1983.

We have a special interest in the outcome of this legislation, since Los Angeles has the largest population of immigrants and refugees, both documented and undocumented, of any city in the United States.

We do not believe that this important legislation has been properly presented for public debate, particularly within the impacted minority communities. While Congressional hearings have been held, representatives of the immigrant and minority groups which will be most affected by this legislation have not been adequately heard.

We believe that immigration reform legislation is needed. However, we are of the view that the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation would be a major step away from achieving this goal. In our judgment, immigration reform must address the following: a broad and humane amnesty proposal under which undocumented immigrants presently living in the United States can qualify; elimination of the massive visa backlogs; humanization of the treatment of undocumented immigrants and applicants for political asylum (including access to essential social services); preservation and expansion of the family reunification programs; and, elimination of the temporary worker programs.

Instead of accomplishing these objectives, we believe that the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation would cause:

1. Massive increases in the importation and inevitable exploitation of temporary workers;

2. Significant increases in the existing back-logs of visa applications;

3. Cut-backs in the already minimal, but essential, due process rights in proceedings before the Immigration and Naturalization Service;

4. An ineffective "amnesty" program which will deny legalization to the great majority of undocumented workers, while creating a massive pool of exploitable "temporary resident" workers, and threatening thousands of immigrant families with mass deportations;

5. Reduction of lawful immigration for family reunification purposes, while increasing lawful immigration opportunities for those of wealth (in our opinion this will simply increase the number of immigrants entering the United States without documents); and,

6. Discrimination against minorities and unnecessary hardships for U.S. employers, labor unions and employees, through implementation of the employer sanctions programs.

For all of the above reasons, we urge that further Congressional consideration of a comprehensive overhaul of the Immigration and Nationality Act be deferred in this Congress.

We urge your opposition to the Simpson/Mazzoli legislation, and hope that a more humane and comprehensive bill can be prepared for and considered in the next Congress.

Sincerely Yours,

Most Reverend Juan Arzube, Roman Catholic Archdiocese, Los Angeles; Bishop Stanley E. Olson, Pacific Southwest Synod, Lutheran Church in America; Reverend Eugene C. Boutilier, Executive Director, So. UNITED STATES SHOULD KEEP WEATHER SATELLITES

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on September 19, I along with 14 of my colleagues in the House and 9 Members of the Senate, introduced a concurrent resolution which expresses the sense of Congress that it is not appropriate at this time to transfer ownership or management of any civil meteorological satellite system and associated ground system equipment to the private sector.

This year the Natural Resources Subcommittee of the House Committee on Science and Technology, which is chaired by the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. SCHEUER, held five hearings on the proposed commercialization of our earth satellite system. During those hearings, one idea became abundantly clear; President Reagan's decision to transfer our Government's weather satellite system to the private sector is not a sensible or cost-effective idea.

Presently, the National Weather Service accounts for 95 percent of the first use of our weather data. Does it then make economic sense for the Government to sell its $1.6 billion weather satellite system to a private concern at a greatly reduced rate, only to sign a long-term monopolistic contract for data services which could end up costing taxpayers more than $100 million per year.

Our national security depends greatly upon data gathered by our weather satellites. Under the current arrangement, the Department of Defense receives priority consideration for information from these satellites during emergency situations. Is it smart to risk our national security to a private company whose primary motivation is profit not service? A joint Department of Defense/NASA study on this issue concluded that "there is considerable financial, policy, and program risk to the government in commercializing weather satellites. . . ." In fact, the Department of Defense in reviewing the Commerce Department's "Request for Proposal" for commercialization insisted that a provision be included which would continue our policy of allowing the free and open distribution of weather data to our allies around the world. They insisted on the provision because of their fear that should the United States begin selling weather data to foreign governments instead of offering it free, those foreign governments will limit the data they provide to the United States, data which is crucial to our international military operations.

This leads to the inescapable conclusion that the transfer of weather satellites to the private sector is not militarily prudent nor commercially viable. If free weather data to foreign governments is guaranteed, as proposed by the administration, then foreign markets for the weather data are eliminated. Because the information being disseminated to the foreign countries will be traveling on public airwaves, the information will be easily picked up by domestic markets as well. In short, the only market left for the weather data will be the U.S. Government.

Although these facts alone argue against the transfer of our weather satellites to the private sector, the lessons of Hurricane Alicia and the devastation she wreaked on the Texas gulf coast region generally, and my district specifically, was and is a chilling reminder of how valuable our weather satellites and the national weather services are to ensuring the safety of millions of Americans who reside in areas which regularly experience severe weather conditions. The lives that were saved and the property damage that was avoided because of the accurate and timely reports on the progress of the storm provided by the Hurricane Control Center and the local National Weather Service stations are substantial. Who but the Federal Government should have the responsibility for providing these forecasts and warnings regarding severe weather in order to protect property and guard the public safety?

A clear message must be sent to the President that Congress is not interested in placing our national security and public safety in the hands of private concerns. I have been asked on several occasions why I have introduced this legislation when Congress has already passed a joint resolution declaring that no sale of weather satellites should take place without congressional approval of its terms. The reason is simple: We do not need to wait for the Department of Commerce to complete the RFP process before alerting the administration to our opposition to the inclusion of weather satellites. Selling our Nation's weather satellites is a bad idea; it was a bad idea last March when the administration proposed it and it's a bad idea now. It is time to settle the question of weather satellites once and for all, and concentrate on the crucial issues surrounding our land remote sensing satellites.

I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to a series of editorials from the Houston Post, the New York Times, Washington Post, and USA Today, all of which voice opposition to the sale of our weather satellites. The arguments they make are quite compelling, and I ask that you take the time to review them carefully.

I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in sponsoring this worthwhile and timely legislation. Let's not waste any more time or money on this issue. Even if the administration turns a deaf ear to our mandate at least our collective voice will ring loud and clear in the board rooms of those companies who would bid on our weather satellite system.

Thank you.

[From USA Today]

U.S. SHOULD KEEP WEATHER SATELLITES

Sunshine: $5.
Snow: $10.
Thunderstorms: $25.
Hurricanes: $1,000.

If the Reagan administration goes through with its plan to sell the nation's four weather satellites to private industry, then Americans might find similar price tags on some of the weather information they now receive free.

Routine weather information still would be available to the public, but the administration hasn't explained what would be considered routine. If you live in tornado country, for instance, would the government still provide you with warnings about tornado conditions? Would farmers still be warned about heavy rains and frosts? Would motorists be warned of approaching snowstorms? Or would the private weather firm charge extra for such information?

To what extent would a private firm share essential data with airlines? The space program? The Defense Department? Would it continue the research and expansion that has made America's weather system the best in the world?

There are no answers available to these questions because the administration hasn't studied the potential effects of selling the satellites. But some members of the administration oppose the sale, and hearings on the proposal were quickly scheduled for next month in Congress.

The administration mainly wants to get rid of the Landsat satellite, which surveys the earth for crop information and minerals. Landsat has been losing money because there haven't been enough buyers for the information. But private industry wasn't interested in bidding on Landsat alone, so the weather satellites were added to the package.

What price tag dangles from the weather satellites, which cost $1.6 billion? Only about $315 million. The government also would subsidize the private buyer for 15 years, reportedly to the tune of $5 billion. The Defense Department estimates that the sale would cost taxpayers about $800 million more over 10 years than what it would cost the government to operate the weather satellites.

There may be some government operations that belong in the private sector, but weather forecasting isn't among them. This vital operation touches all our lives. It is essential when we schedule the family picnic, make travel plans, see dark, heavy clouds swallow the horizon.

The Weather Service has helped to save lives. Its warnings about cold weather and rain result in millions of dollars in crop savings each year. It is one of the most vital services provided by government, and the proposal to farm it out to private industry should be met with thunder and lightning—and a whole lot of hail.

[From the Houston Post, July 31, 1983]

SATELLITE SALE STORM

President Reagan's porposal to sell the government's expensively developed weather satellites to a private corporation is being protested by the World Meteorological Organization based in Geneva. Aksel C. Wiin-Nielsen, secretary-general of the U.N. agency, appeared before a House subcommittee to warn that commercialization of the satellites could have strong repercussions for weather observation everywhere.

Control of the space system by a private company, he said, "would result in a degradation of the quality of satellite-derived meteorological observations, which are the life blood of the world meteorological system." In the Commerce Department proposal to sell the satellites, it was apparent that the Communications Satellite Corporation would be the only likely bidder. Deputy Commerce Secretary Guy W. Fiske resigned last May after admitting that he had discussed prospects for working for COMSAT at the same time he was supervising the study that resulted in the sale proposal.

So far the White House has shown no recognition of the possible weakness in the plan or mounting opposition to it. Rep. Harold L. Volkmer, D-Mo., chairman of the House Science and Technology Committee's Space Subcommittee, says that in the series of hearings there has been little evidence of support for the proposed sale, in contrast to strong opposition. It would expedite a decision if the administration would withdraw a proposal that has so many evident drawbacks.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 10, 1983]

SELLING THE WEATHER

The Reagan administration wishes to sell the weather satellites and impose the discipline of the market on the four winds. First, let's consider the administration's proposition on its own terms. Struggling to keep its budget down, it doesn't want to spend more money on weather satellites. But the technology of weather forecasting is advancing rapidly. With more satellite data pouring through the new giant computers, the forecasts might soon be made immensely more precise.

Under the administration's plan, it would sell the present satellites to a private company, or companies, that would then presumably proceed to use private funds to expand the system. The government would pay the private operators roughly what it's spending now for satellite data. The data would continue to go to the Weather Service for dissemination throughout the country and the world. There would be no difference in the weather report that you get on the radio in the morning as you try to decide whether to take an umbrella. But—if the plan worked—there would soon begin to be a flow of much more specific and accurate forecasts available at a price to commercial users willing to pay. As the administration might put the question, why should the general taxpayer provide free service to businesses?

The answer is, of course, that it's not only businesses that have an interest in more accurate forecasting. Storm warnings are an obvious example. If a city were to fall behind in its satellite bills, when would it hear about the next snowstorm? Among the businesses that need better weather information, the most important is farming. It's not only a matter of cheaper food. If a farmer knows exactly how the wind will blow for the next several days, he can afford to use less pesticide when he sprays. With better rain forecasts, he needs less water for irrigation. And that saves money for the federal government itself, since it is the government that provides most of the water. When the administration speaks of the cost of the additional satellites as hundreds of millions of dollars, that is not the net cost. Net cost is less, if better weather data help the economy to operate more efficiently.

The debate over the weather satellites is another example of the truth that cutting the federal budget doesn't always save money. If it simply means shifting costs from public to private budgets, society doesn't necessarily gain. In this instance society would lose by a substantial amount with the restriction on access to forecasts of value to just about everybody. But it's merely a hypothetical case, since Congress seems totally disinclined to pass the legislation.

[From the New-York Times, May 14, 1983]

A GOVERNMENT THAT WOULD SELL THE SKY

A few weeks ago the Administration announced it was going to sell the nation's four weather satellites to private industry. Instead of presenting a specific case for commercialization, it merely waved the flag of anti-Government ideology. The satellites "would be better operated by the private sector," the White House asserted. "The private sector is what made America great," explained the official in charge of the satellites.

This high-orbit rhetoric, it turns out, clothed a more mundane purpose. It wasn't the private sector that pursuaded the Administration to action, but a private track established by the Communications Satellite Corporation inside the Department of Commerce, which runs the satellites. Comsat had been lobbying for two years to have the Government sell it the $1.6 billion satellite system for about $300 million, and buy back the data at a guaranteed profit.

First it tried to persuade the department to cut the satellites' budget, apparently to make the case for divestiture easier. When the proposed sale was rejected last year by the Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade, the private company persuaded Commerce Secretary Baldrige to order a review. The council was then headed by the Deputy Secretary of Commerce, Guy Fiske. And Mr. Fiske, it now turns out, was holding discussions for a job with Comsat during the period of review. Eight months later the Cabinet Council reversed itself and Mr. Reagan announced the sale would be made.

The department's general counsel has ruled that Mr. Fiske's actions "create the appearance of (a) using public office for private gain; (b) giving preferential treatment to the corporation and (c) losing impartiality." There was no actual conflict, the counsel contends, since Mr. Fiske did not himself make the decision to sell. But the Justice Department is investigating his actions, and Mr. Fiske, denying any wrondoing, has now resigned.

Operating the satellites is an intrinsically governmental function, for which no commercial market exists. True, weather forecasts could be sold, but satellite data are only one of their ingredients. Selling the satellites to Comsat would deprive the Weather Service of control over an important asset and reduce the quality of forecasts for no evident gains in efficiency.

The Administration justified this bizarre plan with a facade of unsupported rhetoric, behind which Comsat was busy tugging strings and dangling job offers. Comsat succeeded in obtaining a Presidential decision in its favor, even though Congress now seems certain to block the sale.

What kind of a Government is it that can be so easily manipulated to act against the public's clear interest?●

SALUTES AMBASSADOR JOHN LOEB

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the American people can be very proud of our Ambassador to Denmark, John Loeb, who returns to the United States this week to join the U.S. delegation for the 38th General Assembly of the United Nations. In a high tribute to Ambassador Loeb's untiring work on behalf of strengthening United States-Danish relations, the Government of Denmark presented him with one of its most prestigious awards, the Grand Cross of the Order of Dannebrog.

The Order of Dannebrog was established in 1671 by King Christian V for extraordinarily meritorious service—primarily for Danish citizens. Her Majesty Queen Margrethe II, at a farewell meeting, decorated Ambassador Loeb with this award. The text of Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann's remarks on this occasion follows:

REMARKS BY THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF DENMARK, HIS EXCELLENCY UFFE ELLEMANN-JENSEN, AT THE FAREWELL LUNCHEON IN HONOR OF THE UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR JOHN L. LOEB, JR. AT THE DANISH FOREIGN MINISTRY IN COPENHAGEN

Mr. Ambassador, Dear John, Ladies and Gentlemen, by tradition, the Danish Foreign Minister and the Ambassador of the United States of America maintain a dialogue on a variety of important bilateral and international matters.

During your term as ambassador here in Copenhagen we have been able to continue this useful "exercise" through our many open minded and direct conversations.

Let me take this opportunity to say that I have always appreciated the frankness and personal involvement with which you have engaged yourself in our conversation. I also know and appreciate that during your numerous visits to various parts of Denmark you have engaged yourself in a frank and useful dialogue with the grassroots of this country, not least with our young people.

During your stay here we have witnessed with great satisfaction a steady increase in the contacts at all levels between our two nations. Let me mention, as a few cases in point, the Prime Minister's visit to Washington last year, my own conversations with Secretary Shultz on numerous occasions, the visit to Denmark of Deputy Secretary Kenneth Dam earlier this year, and last but not least the very successful visit of Vice President Bush two months ago.

During my visit to Rebild with the Vice President I had the opportunity to point to the historic and strong ties between Denmark and the United States, based upon a close community outlook and ideals. I also mentioned the importance of spurring the dialogue and maintaining unity across the Atlantic. Your mission here has served that purpose, John, and we are grateful for your contribution.

I would like also to make some comments on Danish-American trade relations.

For many years your country has ranked among Denmark's five largest trading partners. During the last three years the United States has been a dynamic market for our exports. This year Danish exports to the United States are expected to reach the 10 billion kroner mark, and 6 percent of the total Danish exports now go to the United States.

In 1983, for the first time in decades Denmark will have surplus on its trade with the United States.

We are fully aware, of course, that trade is a two-way traffic. We therefore also appreciate the importance of the United States as one of our main suppliers. In fact, your country ranks as number 5. The dramatic rise in Danish imports of American goods in 1981 from 7 to 11 billion Danish kroner was partly accounted for by the higher exchange rate for the U.S. dollar, but certainly also by increased Danish purchase from the United States of coal, aircraft and machinery. However, the current exchange rates face the U.S. exporters with hard competition in the Danish market.

For the very first days of your stay in Denmark, Mr. Ambassador, you have taken a very vivid interest in Danish art and culture. You are a frequent and welcome guest in Danish art museums and galleries and the modern Danish paintings which you have acquired and placed on the walls of your Residence will always bear witness to your taste for the best Danish art.

However, your interest in Danish culture has not been only a personal matter. At the official level you have been very active in promoting mutual knowledge of the cultures of our two countries. In regard to Scandinavia Today and particularly in regard to the Danish events in connection with Scandinavia Today you have been a source of inspiration. Your active co-operation has been highly evaluated by the Danes who have worked on these projects. In a few weeks the Prime Minister will inaugurate the last of the Danish events in this field, the exhibition "King and Citizens" in the Jewish Museum in New York City. And we have good reasons to thank you especially for the inspiration you have provided to that project.

You are now about to leave Copenhagen for New York to take up an important assignment as United States Representative to the United Nations General Assembly. I hope that when back in that great country of yours you will remember Denmark, not only as a small and pleasant country in a corner of Europe, but also as a country deeply committed to the Atlantic cooperation and to friendship with the United States.

We thank you and we wish you and your family all the best in the future. Allow me, as a token of remembrance, to present to you this piece of Royal Danish Porcelain.●

RESULTS OF CONSTITUENT SURVEY

HON. RALPH REGULA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to report the results of my most recent constituent survey. The people of the 16th District of Ohio represent a cross section of America and can therefore be indictative of the mood of the country. The survey comprised 18 questions of national concern. I hope my colleagues find the results informative and useful.

Questionnaire results follow:

1. Should automobiles sold in the U.S. be required to contain a percentage of American parts and labor? Yes—66.67 percent. No—31.06 percent.

2. Do you favor paying housing allowances directly to tenants to give them some choice in obtaining adequate housing under subsidized programs? Yes—18.56 percent. No—76.89 percent.

3. Do you favor a law which would allow young persons to be employed part-time for less than minimum wage? Yes—66.29 percent. No—32.95 percent.

4. Do you favor ERA? Yes—67.23 percent. No—29.55 percent.

5. Do you favor federal tuition-tax credits for parents who send their children to private schools? Yes—44.13 percent. No—54.55 percent.

6. Do you favor voluntary prayer in public schools? Yes—85.42 percent. No—13.26 percent.

7. Do you favor increasing the amount of general revenue monies used to finance the Medicare program to keep it solvent after 1988? Yes—52.08 percent. No—43.18 percent.

8. Do you agree with Pres. Reagan's foreign policy in El Savlador? Yes—34.66 percent. No—54.55 percent.

9. Do you favor repeal of income tax indexing provisions? Yes—31.63 percent. No—59.66 percent.

10. Do you favor defense-spending cutbacks to reduce the deficit? Yes—59.85 percent. No—37.50 percent.

11. Do you favor domestic-spending cutbacks to reduce the deficit? Yes—69.51 percent. No—26.52 percent.

12. Do you believe the U.S. should provide covert aid to forces opposing the Sandinistas in Nicaragua? Yes—27.84 percent. No—60.42 percent.

13. Do you support continued controls on the wellhead price of natural gas? Yes—68.75 percent. No—22.54 percent.

14. Do you support import quotas as a means of combating dumped or subsidized imports? Yes—75.76 percent. No—17.61 percent.

15. Do you support the President's proposal for antinuclear laser defense system in space? Yes—54.92 percent. No—32.95 percent.

16. Do you favor a bilateral and verifiable U.S.-Soviet nuclear weapons freeze? Yes—83.14 percent. No—12.31 percent.

SYLVIA L. CASH

HON. TIM VALENTINE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, Sylvia L. Cash, CPS, was elected on July 18, 1983, as international president-elect of Professional Secretaries International. Ms. Cash, a member and former president of the District of Columbia chapter of PSI, has had a distinguished career as a professional secretary and has served in numerous capacities within PSI. Selected to fill the highest post in the preeminent professional association of secretaries, an organization with over 40,000 members, Ms. Cash stands as a model for her profession.

A native of Durham, N.C., an integral part of North Carolina's Second Congressional District, Ms. Cash is currently secretary to McGee Grigsby, Partner, and Bruce C. Rosenblum, Associate, with the law firm of Latham, Watkins & Hills in Washington, D.C. She has served as treasurer, vice president, and president of the District of Columbia chapter of PSI and as vice president and president of the Delaware-Maryland District of Columbia Division of PSI. From 1979 to 1981, Ms. Cash was the international director for the southeast district and during 1982 and 1983, she held the post of international first vice president.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Ms. Cash on this outstanding achievement.●

THIS IS YOUR SQUADRON

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, this weekend in Williamsburg, Va., the 414th Night Fighter Squadron will come together after almost 40 years to celebrate their achievements in the Mediterranean theater and throughout the Second World War. Like many other units of the 12th Air Force, the 414th played a key role in the defeat of Nazi Germany and the retaking of northern Africa and western Europe for the forces of freedom. These gallant men and their families deserve the congratulations and best wishes of the U.S. Congress as they move into retirement. They have served this Nation well and have earned our undying respect and admiration for the contributions they have made to the preservation of democracy.

So that we may once again appreciate the contribution of the men of the 414th and their comrades who died during the war and since, I will include a brief history of the squadron written soon after the war by 1st Lt., Air Corps, J. E. Swartz.

THIS IS YOUR SQUADRON

Perhaps twenty years from now, when our children study the history of World War II, they will know little about the 414 Night Fighter Squadron. To them this war, so real to us now, will be vague and unfamiliar. They will know only that it was over and victory was ours. Individual units will be lost in the maize of events before them. To us, the men in the 414, it is important, however. It is an organization that its members are proud of, one that takes pride in every man in it, now that one big job, the European War, is written off. We'd like to take time to reflect and sum up just what the "Four One Four" has accomplished during the twenty-eight months since January 26, 1943 when it was activated at Orlando, Florida.

Under the command of Major A. W. Cowgill, the newly-formed 414 N.F.S. spent its first month completing the complement of Officers and Enlisted Men in preparation for the jump across the "Big Pond". The Air Echelon departed from Camp Kilmer, New Jersey, on 23 March 1943, sailing on the old Empress of Japan, now known as the Empress of Scotland. Debarking at Liverpool, England, they proceeded to Cranfield Airdrome. It was here that they first met the English Beaufighter, or "Bristol's Abortion", as someone so aptly dubbed it.

While the Air Echelon was undergoing operational training, the Ground Echelon left Kilmer and headed for Oran, Africa. It is doubtful if members of the original group arriving at Oran will ever forget it. Here it was that they learned the horrible truth that not all the travel folders about picturesque and sunny Africa were true. Living in pup tents, surrounded by mud up to their knees, and being introduced to that famous army delicacy, "C" Rations, left a lasting impression.

In mid-June the Ground Echelon moved to Reghaia Airfield, Algeria, Africa, to set up the base in preparation for the arrival of the rest of the squadron. In the meantime the Air Echelon had completed its training in "Beau's", seen the sights of England, enjoyed the hospitality of the British airmen who trained them, and were getting ready to proceed to Reghaia.

At the tail-end of the Tunisian Campaign and just before the invasion of Sicily the 414th became operational in the early part of July 1943, being the first American N.F.S. to operate in this theatre. Most of their work consisted of long, tiring harbor patrols, or protecting shipping on the African Coast. However, in the latter part of July a detachment was sent to Protville, Tunisia, from whence aircraft of the squadron flew on offensive patrols for the period of about one week in an attempt to intercept enemy transports flying between Italy and the islands of Corsica and Sardinia. Two Italian transports were destroyed during these operations, in addition to an "assist" on another victory which was scored by 415 squadron.

Meanwhile, the routine work of protecting harbors and convoys was kept up, and after the opening of the Italian campaign in September, 1943, the squadron moved to Elmas, Sardinia, in the latter part of October, the island having been evacuated by the Germans a very short time before. The unit was then under the command of Major Earl T. Smith, who had replaced Major Cowgill in September.

By the time the Anzio beachhead was opened late in January, 1944, the squadron had four victories to its credit, all of them having been daylight encounters. With the new campaign under way, the job of protecting Anzio from attacks by aircraft based in Southern France was given to the squadron. This was carried out by detachments operating from advanced fields in Corsica, while normal operations were continued from the home base at Elmas, in addition to a considerable amount of Air-Sea-Rescue work. The success of the detachment in Corsica in stopping attacks on shipping at Anzio by the German Air Force in Southern France was the basis for the Presidential Citation which was later awarded the squadron.

On 1 June 1944, Lt. Col. C. H. Bolender, than a Major took command of the squadron, replacing Major Smith, who was transferred to assume command of a Fighter Control Area. 8 June 1944 marked a new era: Night Intruder work over Southern France. The 414 was the first American N.F.S. to do night intruding. Since that time, they have kept up the record by getting more experience and better results than any other similar outfit.

The next three months was spent in moving, 22 June 1944 they moved from Elmas to Alghero, Sardinia; 4 September from Alghero to Borgo Airfield, Corsica; and finally to Pisa Airfield on the Italian mainland, 12 October 1944. Remaining operational during all these moves was not easy, what with intruder missions and patrols being flown in support of the invasion of Southern France, and additional intruders being flown over the Po Valley in Northern Italy, but it was done.

After moving to Pisa the squadron began to do more and more intruder work. This they handled in grand style, severely hampering the enemy's communications and transportation in the Po Valley. Patrols were limited mostly to "Nickelling" missions, (dropping of Psychological Warfare leaflets to German troops). Many of these "Nickels" have been instrumental in bringing about the surrender of "Jerry" soldiers.

On 28 November the squadron moved from Pisa to Pontedera Airfield, Italy, where they are at this writing. For a Christmas present they received their first P-61 "Black Widow". They continued operating in the Beaufighter while undergoing transitional flying in the "Widow", however, and on 20 January 1945 the last was seen of "Old Beau" as it was bid a fond good-bye, and the squadron then went operational in the P-61. For many of the men there will always be a soft spot in their hearts for the "Beau", but with a newer and faster aircraft they were hoping to continue to put the fear and respect of their striking power into the hearts of the enemy that "Whispering Death", as the "Hun" called the Beaufighter, had given them.

On 27 January 1945 twenty-six officers and fifty-two enlisted men left the squadron with six aircraft for Belgium. Here they were to work with the 422nd Night Fighter Squadron in the Campaign of Western German.

The remaining part of the squadron, here in Italy, under the direction of Lt. Col. Bolender was initiating yet another new night fighter technique: Night bombing with the P-61. With bombs at their disposal they pounded harder than ever before at enemy installations during the last days of the Italian war. The climax was reached when, at the height of the Po Valley Campaign, the squadron was called on one day to perform daylight bombing missions. With everyone in the squadron hard at work, (even some of the cooks were helping on the line) a maximum effort was put forth, and the first mission saw every one of the squadron's aircraft airborne on a mission.

In the meantime the crews in Belgium had been maintaining an excellent intruder record and had moved on to Euskirchen, Germany with the 422nd. There they added two more "firsts" to the squadron's list, being the first American Night Fighter to take off on an operational mission from German soil and getting credit for the first four victories over enemy aircraft by American Night Fighters based in Germany.

In summing up, Let us say again, we have an outfit to be proud of. Perhaps, not the most famous there is, but one that has done a job and done it well. Let our record speak for itself.

Total operational hours: 6952:45.
Aircraft destroyed: 13.
Aircraft probably destroyed: 1.
Aircraft damaged: 1.
Locomotives destroyed: 38.
Locomotives damaged: 68.
Rail cars destroyed: 17.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. BARBARA HICKS

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Camp Fire Council of the Foothills will honor one of its most dedicated and active volunteers, Mrs. Barbara Hicks, on October 26, 1983.

Since she first became a Camp Fire girl at the age of 11, Barbara Hicks has been as closely involved with the movement as anyone else in the history of the Camp Fire Council of the Foothills.

She has been a camp counselor; an assistant camp director at Camp Wasewagan in the San Bernardino mountains; a Blue Bird leader and a member of the professional staff of the Santa Fe Trail Council Camp Fire for 5 years, later serving as council president.

During her many years of cheerful and able service, Mrs. Hicks has received two national Camp Fire honors for imaginative leadership and distinguished volunteer service to the community and its youth.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to help honor a woman whose record of care and concern for Camp Fire girls is unmatched. For the years of affectionate giving, Mrs. Hicks deserves our gratitude, esteem, and emulation.●

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE CONGRESSMAN PHILLIP BURTON

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues these fine remarks in honor of our late friend, Congressman Phillip Burton. They were made by Ralph M. Hockley, president of Chapter 65, San Francisco, National Association of Retired Federal Employees at the presentation and planting of a memorial tree in a meadow of the Golden Gate National Recreation Area on August 29, 1983.

Congresswoman Sala Burton, Mayor Feinstein, Superintendent Davis, Representatives of Senator Cranston and Congresswoman Boxer, members of the San Francisco Chapter of the National Association of Retired Federal Employees, Guests:

We are assembled here today to do something which, in our day and age and the hectic pace of our lives, is done far too infrequently: to say thanks to a loyal friend for what he did for us and for our country. Sadly, the friend we are honoring today, the Hon. Phillip Burton, Congressman for the Fifth District of California for almost 20 years, was taken from our midst in April. As a result, he was unable to complete the task he had set for himself. But we who are assembled here today know that what he accomplished in the time given to him on this earth, be it for the environment, the underprivileged or for retirees like ourselves, was indeed a great deal.

We have come together this morning to pay homage to our friend, Phil Burton. In searching for an appropriate manner to say thanks, we of the San Francisco chapter of NARFE felt that we could best honor Phil by planting a tree, a Monterey Cypress, in the midst of this meadow which belongs to the Golden Gate National Recreation Area, an area which he was instrumental in creating. All of us know how close to his heart the improvement of the environment was.

We of NARFE are thanking Phillip Burton this morning for his many years of support in Congress of Federal Government retirees and of active employees of the Federal Government. He always understood that loyalty was a two way street and that, if the American people expected, as it should, total loyalty from the Federal workforce, those government workers also deserved the loyalty of those who have control of their destinies, the President, as head of the Executive Branch, and the Congress, in its legislative efforts. There has been in the past seven years, a considerable amount of controversy regarding the rights of Federal Government employees and retirees. This controversy has dealt with both employment conditions and retirement benefits. I am proud to say that in all the debates which have taken place regarding these topics, our good friend Phillip Burton, never flinched in his support of government employees and retirees and that his understanding of loyalty was one of total loyalty. He looked at government retirees as human beings and treated them as such. In a day and age when a social conscience has become more and more a rarity among politicians, Phil Burton exhibited his social conscience on a continuing basis. He was a real "Mensch," a real human being. We thank him today for having fought on our behalf for so many years by having planted this Monterey Cypress as a living and loving memorial to him. A plaque, to be placed in the National Park Service Headquarters nearby, will remind future visitors and citizens of Phil Burton's activities and of our gratitude. The plaque states:

"In Memory of the Honorable Phillip Burton, United States Representative, August 29, 1983, A Monterey Cypress tree was planted at the northern edge of the Great Meadow, across from the stairway leading to lower Fort Mason, in gratitude for the many services he rendered their association, by the members of National Association of Retired Federal Employees, San Francisco Chapter No. 65."

Congresswoman Sala Burton, it is my pleasure and privilege to present this plaque to you. Golden Gate Recreation Area Superintendent John Davis will see to it that it is properly exhibited in his headquarters building. Do consider these two tokens as an expression of our friendship and our thanks to your late husband. We will always remember him with fondness. Thank you.●

AMERICAN LEGION POST NO. 273

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, It is my distinct pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House the installation of officers of the American Legion Post No. 273 of Burlington, Mass. This fine organization, like American Legion posts throughout our Nation, provides sound advice and a helping hand in times of need to veterans and their families. Post No. 273 in particular has established itself as an important part of the town of Burlington, and a great deal of the credit should go to the Post's outgoing Commander John O'Neil and outgoing Auxiliary President Charlotte O'Neil. I am certain newly installed Commander Lawrence E. Wilson and Auxiliary President Marianne Ganley will maintain the post's extraordinary record of service.

I ask my colleagues to join me in commending the past work of Post No. 273 and in extending very best wishes for a fruitful and fulfilling future.●

LEGISLATION TO CLARIFY FEDERAL-STATE REGULATION OF DUTY-FREE SHOPS

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, today Mr. DORGAN, Mr. AKAKA, and I are introducing legislation to protect longstanding concession relations that some States and local authorities have established with duty-free stores operating within their borders. This legislation will clarify the legal status of duty-free shops that operate in many U.S. airports and other international terminals in this country. We are introducing this bill to remedy a problem that has been created for duty-free shops by recent actions by Congress and the U.S. Customs Service, which have inadvertently jeopardized both the operations of a number of legitimate duty-free businesses and the longstanding ability of States to regulate certain aspects of duty-free shop operations.

As anyone who has ever been to an international airport knows, duty-free shops offer merchandise for sale exclusively to international travelers. However, duty-free shops are not limited to airport locations. Along the Canada and Mexico borders, for example, a number of small retail liquor stores operate duty-free outlets to sell to customers who are leaving the country.

International travelers can purchase duty-free merchandise, whether French perfume, Japanese cameras, or tax-free domestic goods at frequently substantial savings. These savings can be realized because the merchandise is sold to the departing traveler free from the duty that must be paid on such goods if they were intended for consumption in the United States.

A number of States have established concession arrangements with duty-free stores that operate at or otherwise use the facilities of State-run airport or other terminal facilities. These concession arrangements can often provide the State or other government authority with substantial revenues to help offset the operating costs associated with the terminal facility. In my State of Hawaii, for example, duty-free license arrangements provide the State airport authority with over 40 percent of its total, statewide operating costs. In 1981, the contribution made to the State airport system, which is extensive due to the island nature of my State, amounted to $36 million.

As the Federal Government continues its efforts to shift the financial burden of various programs to State and local governments, it is imperative that we not take any action that will interfere with the States' abilities to collect revenues for important public services. In the case of duty-free shop concession fees, we must be especially careful to protect the longstanding relationship between State licensing authorities, where they are requiring concession or other licensing arrangements from such businesses, and legitimate duty-free operations.

The U.S. Customs Service has general regulatory authority over duty-free sales transactions. Under Customs regulations, imported goods to be sold through duty-free retail outlets are deposited in secure, bonded warehouses as soon as they are offloaded in the United States. Once the merchandise is sold through a duty-free outlet to an international traveler, it is to be delivered to the passenger in a secure area just before he leaves the country.

Because the merchandise sold by duty-free operations never technically enters the United States, for the purposes of collecting duty on it, Customs has the job of insuring that duty-free goods are kept from entering the stream of domestic commerce, where they would be in unfair competition with duty-paid goods sold by U.S. merchants. However, because duty-free goods are sold solely to an exclusive market—international travelers leaving the country—duty-free stores do not directly compete with domestic retail shops.

In fact, in my State of Hawaii, the principal duty-free shop operator is one of the islands' major employers, providing jobs for some 1,400 Hawaiian citizens. The Hawaii duty-free shops operate with the sanction of the State legislature and have the full support of the Hawaii State Chamber of Commerce and the Hawaii Visitors Bureau.

Although there have been some problems in the past along the Mexico border, in particular, in insuring that duty-free merchandise could not illegally enter domestic commerce, it is my understanding that the Customs Service has now begun a major effort to fully secure the delivery methods used by these operations. To the extent that these efforts do not interfere with State concession or other licensing arrangements with legitimate proprietors of duty-free goods, I fully support Customs' efforts to insure the integrity of this sales process.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation that we are introducing today will clarify the status of duty-free shops under the law and guarantee that State and local government authorities will continue to be able to require duty-free shop operators to obtain concessions or otherwise meet applicable requirements for operating duty-free shops. First, our bill codifies for the first time a definition of a "duty-free sales enterprise." Second, the bill States that where a State or other governmental authority requires a concession or other form of approval in order to engage in duty-free sales, the operator of the duty-free sales enterprise must demonstrate to the Customs Service that it has met such State or other governmental requirements.

This bill is thus self-policing. Enforcing the legislation will not require any additional manpower from the already strained resources of the U.S. Customs Service. In addition, under the explicit terms of the bill, where a State does not require a concession or other licensing arrangement, no action will be necessary by the duty-free shop operator or by Customs. Finally, the existence of a concession or other form of approval from a State or local authority will not prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from denying application to establish a duty-free sales operation or from withdrawing the privilege of conducting that operation where the applicant or proprietor fails to meet other applicable requirements of Federal law or regulations.

Mr. Speaker, our bill once and for all resolves a problem that first arose approximately 2 years ago when the Customs Service attempted to clarify its regulations affecting the treatment of duty-free shops. At the same time, this bill will reserve an important source of revenues for many already beleaguered State governments.

This legislation is the result of a cooperative effort between Congress and the U.S. Customs Service. Moreover, the Trade Subcommittee, on which I serve, has indicated that it will try to hold hearings in the next few weeks on this uncontroversial but necessary legislation. I hope that Congress can act promptly to enact this bill.●

CUT DEFICIT FIRST

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, last week, I voted against H.R. 1036, the Community Renewal Employment Act. I opposed this bill because I think it is wrong for Congress to proceed on a phase 2 jobs programs without having addressed the deficit crisis that confronts the country.

I do not believe that new jobs are created in the long run by increasing the Federal deficit that is already approaching $200 billion. The fact is, our country cannot sustain these kind of deficits and hope to maintain any kind of long-term economic growth.

I am not opposed to jobs or any type of legitimate aid to the unemployed, and I am willing to work in any way possible to create new jobs in this country. Congress has already committed itself to spend over $14 billion on new jobs, job training, and unemployment programs during fiscal years 1983–85, and I have supported these. But new jobs or long-term employment are not created in the long run by passing legislation that will only increase the burden on the budget deficit and our Nation's economy. What we end up doing is choking off economic recovery because it means that we will be spending more money without the resources to pay for it.

And I just cannot vote for another substantial spending program until congressional leaders and the President are willing to get serious about confronting this deficit problem. I support a freeze on all Federal spending in order to solve this problem, and I am working on my own legislation to do something about this. I think it is time that our Nation's leaders take some action in this regard, too.●

H.R. 1285—THE NATIONAL HERITAGE RESOURCE ACT

HON. RICK BOUCHER

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join a number of my colleagues in cosponsoring H.R. 1285, the National Heritage Resource Act.

This much needed legislation will amend a 1969 law which originally was devised to stop the large tax deductions taken by individuals who donated their personal memoirs and political papers to various institutions.

An indirect and unforeseen consequence of the 1969 law is that it discourages many artists, writers, and other creators of original works from contributing their art to museums and libraries. The law has resulted in a tax inequity because collectors can donate art and receive the full market value, whereas, an artist is only allowed a deduction for the actual costs of the materials.

As a result of this law, many museums, research institutions, and libraries have suffered a sharp decline in acquisitions from living authors, musicians, scientists, and other artists. The Library of Congress has received only one major original manuscript since 1969, as contrasted with pre-1969 average donations of more than 200,000. All of the Nation's major artistic institutions along with colleges and universities have been disadvantaged as a result of the 1969 law.

The passage of H.R. 1285 will correct this unfortunate situation affecting our public institutions and artists. This measure will assist these institutions in obtaining manuscripts, personal papers, photographs, and works of art by allowing the creators of such original items to deduct the full market value of their contributions. This legislation is supported by many major cultural and educational organizations including the Council of Creative Artists, Libraries and Museums, the American Council on Education, and the Association of American Universities.

This legislation also safeguards the possibility of abuse by listing specific requirements of applicability. The exclusion of political and personal papers from public officials insures that the sense of the 1969 law is retained.

I hope that H.R. 1285 will receive the favorable consideration of the House.●

BANKRUPTCY AND POLITICS: CHAIRMAN RODINO REPLIES

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post did not print the complete text of Chairman RODINO's reply to Representative HYDE's op-ed piece of September 22, 1983, "Bankruptcy and Politics," which accused the House Democratic leadership of thwarting resolution of the bankruptcy court constitutional problem because of partisan political considerations. I think my colleagues should have the benefit of the chairman's full response to Representative HYDE's comments. The chairman's reply follows:

CHAIRMAN RODINO'S REPLIES

In an op-ed piece in The Post, "Bankruptcy and Politics" (9/22/83), Rep. Henry J. Hyde, R-Ill., praised the Senate for passing a bankruptcy court bill, even though that bill (S. 1013), he says, is probably unconstitutional and laments that the House has not acted to resolve the bankruptcy court crisis. He acknowledges that he supports a bankruptcy court measure (H.R. 3) passed by the House Judiciary Committee that is of clear constitutionality, but accuses the House Democratic leadership, including me, of thwarting resoluton of the bankruptcy court problem for partisan political reasons: that we want to prevent President Reagan from appointing any new judges.

This is one of the rare issues on which Representative Hyde and I almost agree, for he is right on the law but wrong on the politics of the issue. It is the injection of legislative issues totally unrelated to the bankruptcy constitutional problem and the Administration's own politics-playing that has stymied resolution of the bankruptcy court issue.

On the bankruptcy court issue we agree on what should be done: Establish an Article III court in which the judges are given lifetime tenure and are protected from pay cuts. H.R. 3 does that, and it provides President Reagan authority to appoint at least two-thirds of the 227 judges authorized—all of them if he is re-elected.

That is all the bill does. Politics has been injected into this matter, but the injection has come not from the Democratic leadership but from the present administration and the lobbyists for selfish financial interests.

The administration has seized on this court crisis to leverage additional lifetime generalist federal judges, which is an entirely separate problem. The money-lenders' lobbyists are seeking to use the bankruptcy court problem as a vehicle to ram through unrelated substantive changes in the bankruptcy laws; changes that are the most controversial and far-reaching in the bankruptcy law in 100 years—changes that would, in the words of one scholar, transform the code into a "mass peonage statute."

Unlike the Senate, the House operates under a germaneness rule to ensure the orderly and thoughtful consideration of legislation. Under it, issues that are not relevant to the subject at hand are out of order. But armies of well-heeled lobbyists are pressuring the Rules Committee to subvert House rules and the traditional legislative process to permit these changes in the law that are totally unrelated to the urgent constitutional issue.

H.R. 3 is stalled, because the Democratic leadership has fought off this unprecedented attempt to undermine the Rules. For with leadership comes responsibility, and a responsible leadership has sought to preserve the institutional integrity of the House, to protect a tradition that has over many years blocked ill-considered special interest legislation. It seeks to do what the House has always tried to do: consider separate issues separately under the deliberative House process.

There may be a need for more federal judges. But there should be hearings to consider that need on a district-by-district basis, as has always been done in the past. There may be a need for changes in the bankruptcy law. I have, in fact, introduced a bill to make substantive bankruptcy law changes, although it does not include the most onerous and overreaching provisions sought by the lenders.

I have repeatedly said that, once the bankruptcy court problem is resolved, I will begin hearings on the other two matters. That pledge still stands.

I can only wish that my colleague Henry Hyde and others who worry about "the stability of our courts and the predictability of our laws"—to use Mr. Hyde's words—would pledge to honor the House Rules and procedures and resolve the court issue separately and swiftly.●

ARTIST, HUMANITARIAN AND COMMUNITY CONTRIBUTOR

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 26, 1983

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, Cleveland Bellow is a national and internationally renown artist whose African heritage is reflected in his many pieces which are prominently displayed. He has lectured through our world as well as studied with the most noted artist to grace the globe.

During the sixties his talents were used to pictorially depict the lifestyle of blacks in the United States. In order to promote appreciation for the arts and to instill the importance of proper instruction, he hosted, free of charge, art classes in the Southern States. Mr. Bellow has, in a number of communities, organized art programs for the youth as well as senior citizens. In addition to these endeavors, he has volunteered his expertise to help elect progressive candidates all over the country.

Mr. Bellow serves as chair on the Alameda County Arts Commission, and serves on the board of directors for Oaklands' Festival of the Arts. He also hosts free seminars for the underprivileged youth and host weekly television programs relating to the arts. Through his work, he has furthered the installation of pride in the minds of black Americans.

It is with great pride that I place the name of Mr. Cleveland Bellow a black American artist, educator, humanitarian and positive role model to be entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, September 27, 1983, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, September 27, 1983

(Legislative day of Monday, September 26, 1983)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Gracious Father in Heaven, this promises to be a pressure week. Thank Thee for the leadership, for their patience, their fairness, and their objectivity. Grant to them special wisdom as they guide the Senate through these days. Grant, dear God, that this week will be one characterized by the finest performance of every Senator and every staff person involved in legislation. Move in our midst in ways that will surprise all of us with the ease and proficiency with which business is done this week. Let it be one of the most memorable experiences in the 98th Congress. Give to every Senator and those associated in the labors of these days a very special dispensation of love and grace and blessing. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 12 noon, at which time the Senate will stand in recess, as we usually do on Tuesdays, for 2 hours, until 2 p.m., so that Senators on both sides of the aisles may attend their separate party caucuses, which are conducted away from the Senate Chamber.

Mr. President, at 2 p.m. the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 159. We will continue to debate that measure today as long as circumstances warrant and dictate.

I do not, however, expect today to be a long day. We can modify that appraisal as other Senators may express their wishes and desires.

However, I do urge Senators to consider that tomorrow will be a very full day and I express the hope that we may be able to finish debate on the war powers resolution on Wednesday, even if it is late Wednesday. The reason for that, Mr. President, is that we also have the CR, the continuing resolution, to deal with this week and the extension of unemployment benefits, both of which expire on midnight Friday.

We must also deal perhaps with the conference report on revenue sharing extension, which also expires this week.

So we have a full week and if it is possible to finish war powers on Wednesday evening, I wish to do that. However, the statutory time for finishing it would be 2 p.m. on Thursday, and maybe we can improve on that.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. President, while I have an opportunity, let me now ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the recognition of the two leaders on tomorrow, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until the hour of 10 a.m. in which Senators may speak for 1 minute each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at 10 a.m., then, the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 159 and will continue with that during the remainder of the day as necessary.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, would the distinguished majority leader indulge a question at this point?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Would the majority leader be willing to start action on the war powers matter, say, at 10:40 a.m.? I would be happy to give up my time and reserve 1 minute. It seems to me that because of the time crunch——

Mr. BAKER. At 9:40 a.m.?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, 9:40 a.m., because that would give us an extra 20 minutes for debate equally divided, and some Senators may have speeches they can make within 10 minutes. One Senator might be able to make it in 10 minutes.

I am afraid we really would be a little short on time.

Mr. BAKER. Of course, I will.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I may ask the majority leader one other thing, I understand there is a matter that is of some importance to the Senator's side of the aisle that will occur this evening. There is a somewhat similar matter that is of importance to this side of the aisle tomorrow evening.

Mr. BAKER. All right.

Mr. BYRD. So what impact will those two events have on our time? Would it be agreeable with the Senator if we went beyond 6 p.m. today, as long as we have assurance there will be no action on any amendment, no business transacted, except statements which might mostly come from this side of the aisle today, and the same thing might occur tomorrow evening with no action, no business, except statements, most of which might come from the other side?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would be happy to do that. I would be happy to continue the Senate in session beyond 6 p.m. on both days for the purpose of statements only if that would be an accommodation, and I believe it would be an accommodation on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. BYRD. And we could run our cloakroom lines at some point to see if there are any Senators indeed who wish to come over and make statements beyond 6 p.m.

Mr. BAKER. Very well.

Mr. President, I will not now put that in a unanimous-consent request. I wish to check one or two things first, but I am sure that would be satisfactory, and I appreciate the suggestion from the minority leader.

However, I think I will go ahead now and change the sequence for in the morning. I wonder if the minority leader is willing to agree that we would each have 2 minutes each instead of 10 minutes each standing order time.

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

ORDER FOR REDUCTION IN LEADERSHIP TIME TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I make that unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, what that means is that at 9:34 a.m., plus or minus a minute or two for the prayer and the opening ceremonies, we would be on the resolution tomorrow, say, by 9:40 a.m.

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. And we will accommodate to whatever the reasonable requirements are tomorrow, and I appreciate the offer of the Senator to do so today.

Mr. President, I believe I have nothing further to add this morning and I yield any remaining time under my control to the minority leader if he wishes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

CONGRATULATIONS, "AUSTRALIA II"

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, late yesterday afternoon, the Australian 12-meter yacht, the Australia II, defeated the American defender Liberty in the 25th contest for the America's cup. The victory breaks the longest winning streak, 132 years, in any sport the world over. Ever since the American Yacht America first wrested the auld cup from the British off the Isle of Wight in 1851, the American defending yacht has successfully prevailed 24 times. Indeed, in no other cup contest, no other contesting boat has won more than two races in the best-of-seven series.

The Australia's victory comes at the final match of the seven-race series, Australia II prevailing for the coveted prize, 4 races to 3.

The Australian challenge was the toughest in the history of the cup. No other contender has beaten an American yacht by the wide margins it did repeatedly. The Australian skipper, John Bertrand, and his crew, as well as the outstanding long-term effort by the brains behind the Australian syndicate, Alan Bond, are to be commended, even though I say this reluctantly and with some degree of envy.

The upwind pointing abilities and quickness of the Australian boat, as well as the fine teamwork of its crew, posed a formidable test which pushed Liberty's tactics and technology to its limits. There is some matter of luck involved here, such as the change in winds. The Aussies have exhibited great spirit and superb sportsmanship throughout this long contest.

The tenacious and talented skipper of Liberty, Dennis Conner and his hard-working crew, as well as the sailmakers, designers, architects, machinists, and the thousands of others who made a material contribution to the American defense, gave it their all.

The contest, as hard fought and close as it was, has done much to invigorate the America's cup contest. I am certain that American sailors will redouble their efforts to wrest the cup back from Australia.

They will do so, in my judgment, when the next contest comes in the waters off of Perth, Australia, in 1987.

Congratulations to both the Australia II crew and the Liberty crew.

Mr. President, I have nothing else at this point. I will be glad to yield my remaining time to the majority leader or yield my time back.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no request for time.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon with statements therein limited to 3 minutes each.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a folder of matters that can be done routinely, I believe. If the minority leader is agreeable, I would like to do that at this time.

COMMEMORATING THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF NASA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, first in my folder is a joint resolution for myself, Mr. GORTON, and many other Senators, commemorating the 25th anniversary of NASA.

I would like to consider this joint resolution today, but it has not yet been printed on the calendar. Instead of asking for its immediate consideration, I ask unanimous consent that it be placed on the calendar, if the minority leader agrees.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection. I would like to have my name included.

Mr. BAKER. I would be happy to do that. I ask unanimous consent that the name of the minority leader be added as a cosponsor directly after my name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of this joint resolution on tomorrow.

AMENDMENT TO THE OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT OF 1982

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, next, a bill, H.R. 3871, has been cleared for action on this side. If the minority leader is prepared to go forward with that, I will ask the Chair to proceed.

Mr. BYRD. There appears to be no objection on this side.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate H.R. 3871.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follow:

A bill (H.R. 3871) to amend the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 to provide that the figure used in determining hourly rates of pay for Federal employees not be changed before the comparability adjustment in the rates of pay for such employees has been made for fiscal year 1984.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would point out to Members that the consideration of this measure at this time is the first utilization of a new section of the Calendar of Business. I refer to page 35, "Matters Being Held at the Desk for Further Action."

It has been remarked by Senators from time to time, and very properly so, that often when matters are cleared for action on both sides they have never been on the calendar. I am trying to make it a practice to have them on the calendar someplace for at least 1 day, as I did with the NASA resolution just now, so that Senators will be on notice.

However, those matters that are at the desk pending further action until now have never been on the calendar anywhere at any time. So at least from the calendar, Members had no way of knowing that they were eligible for consideration. They could, of course, go to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where the action appears, and they would be fully on notice there from a practical standpoint.

But to make it more convenient for Senators to track the matters that may be considered at any time, I have asked the Public Printer to include matters being held at the desk as one of the items on the Calendar of Business.

That has been done today on page 35. H.R. 3871 is the last item in that category.

Mr. President, the bill has now been laid down?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Has consent been given to proceed to its immediate consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I support H.R. 3871 which would delay the effective date for the 2,087-hour provision upon which general schedule pay would be based from October 1983 to January 1984.

The Reconciliation Act of last year changed the base pay computation from 2,080 hours to 2,087 hours. This has the effect of reducing average base pay by about $100 for the year. It is to be effective this October.

Because we are moving the next pay adjustment to January, we should similarly move this provision. Otherwise, Federal employees will find their pay reduced in October and increased in January.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise in support of H.R. 3871. This bill prevents a pay cut for Federal employees next month. H.R. 3871 would delay the effective date of a section of the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1982 that requires a bookkeeping change in the way pay is computed for most Federal employees. This change would result in a pay cut for over 25,000 Federal employees in my own State of New Mexico in October. However, H.R. 3871 provides that the new computation change will not take effect until the pay comparability adjustment also takes effect, thereby eliminating this pay cut.

As my colleagues know, the President has now formally proposed delaying the pay adjustment until next January and capping it at 3.5 percent. Congress earlier endorsed a 4-percent increase in January. But in the meantime affected employees would suffer a pay cut in 2 weeks unless Congress acts.

H.R. 3871 provides that the new computation method will not take effect until the pay comparability adjustment also takes effect. Thus the reduction required by the new computation method will be more than offset by the pay comparability adjustment.

Mr. President, our Federal workers work hard in return for their salary. Over the past year they have been subjected to major changes as a result of the Social Security Amendments of 1983. They vigorously opposed social security coverage. I supported Federal workers in that fight.

Federal workers were needlessly frightened by retirement program changes proposed by the administration in its fiscal year 1984 budget. I opposed those changes, and the changes did not appear in the fiscal year 1984 congressional budget.

Mr. President, H.R. 3871 solves an immediate problem in a way that is fair and equitable to Federal employees. It is also consistent with the intent of last year's legislation. It is worthy of our support.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MATTERS BEING HELD AT THE DESK FOR FURTHER ACTION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in referring to the new items on the calendar, I think that is a good idea but I think it is bad to allow more and more items to be held at the desk for further action without their going to committee. I hasten to say that in some cases it has been my side which has requested that. I would just hope that we not allow this to become too contagious which ends up in an epidemic.

Mr. BAKER. I agree with the minority leader. As a matter of fact, a secondary benefit of having this new category on the calendar will be to remind me of the items being held at the desk which otherwise I might not realize.

If we are not careful, we are going to destroy the committee system by holding matters at the desk. So Members who have matters held at the desk by unanimous consent or otherwise should understand that the leadership on this side intends to try to clean off that calendar as soon as possible.

Mr. BYRD. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I also hope that we would not accelerate too greatly the use of rule XIV. Here again, I have set in motion that rule perhaps more than anybody else on my side, at the request of my colleagues. But I think there again, we have to have a little caution. But I do not know of any way around, if a Senator wants to trigger that rule XIV, keeping them from doing so.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. BYRD. Except to object to the introduction of that bill on that date. And if the majority leader does not have another legislative day for 2 months, the sponsor is held up for 2 months to introduce it.

Mr. BAKER. There are a number of ways that can be done. I have tried to convince a number of Senators who have come to me to propose a bill for the calendar under rule XIV that they should think about that and attempt to do it routinely, because not only does it deprive the committee of jurisdiction, but it also does something that perhaps I should not say, but I am going to say; it delivers that matter into the tender mercy of the keeper of the calendar, and the minority leader and I, really, as a practical matter, are the keepers of the calendar. So there is no guarantee that rule XIV is going to produce a result.

In many cases, or in most cases, perhaps, Members will do better to have it in committee and have the reinforcing approval of the committee reporting that measure than they will just by putting it on the calendar and then the leadership put to the test of deciding whether they are going to take it up or not.

I freely confess that I am not going to take up matters unless I am convinced they should be taken up because of a great national importance or that I am convinced that the committee would like to have them taken up. So rule XIV is not a panacea.

Mr. BYRD. Will the majority leader yield again?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I do not think we have yet gone too far in that direction, but I just am concerned lest we do it. I am also concerned that some committees are not, on the whole, as active as perhaps they should be in dealing with these matters, which is a fact, in itself, that might encourage Senators to proceed the route of rule XIV.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I agree with that. I hope Members will read these remarks and take account of them as they decide whether to proceed under rule XIV.

JOINT REFERRAL OF EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION NO. 1670

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Executive Communication No. 1670, dealing with interstate highways and mass transit, be discharged from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, and that it be jointly referred to the Committee on Environment and Public Works and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I say to the minority leader that next I would propose to go to S. 1046, if he is agreeable.

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

RISK RETENTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Calendar Order No. 275, S. 1046.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1046) to clarify the applicability of a provision of law regarding risk retention.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to speak in support of S. 1046 which clarifies the Risk Retention Act. I hope in light of its technical nature, this bill will receive prompt approval by the Senate. S. 1046 was approved without objection by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

S. 1046 makes clear, as was originally intended, that risk retention and purchasing groups may insure any coverage which constitutes a "product liability" loss, as that term is defined in the Risk Retention Act. This includes insurance by a risk retention group for damage to a product itself (such as builder warranties), as well as injury to persons and other property.

The bill will insure that the definitions in that act are controlling with respect to the scope of the insurance coverage that risk retention groups may provide. It does not expand the Risk Retention Act; it merely clarifies the existing scope of the law. The bill does not, in any way, affect the liability of manufacturers for loss occurring as a result of a product defect.

In 1981, Congress enacted the Product Liability Risk Retention Act. The act was passed to facilitate the ability of businesses to establish self-insurance coverage on a group basis for product liability risks. It also facilitates the ability of businesses to purchase comprehensive general liability insurance on a group basis. This is done by exempting risk retention groups and purchasing groups from certain duplicative and burdensome State laws which have restricted the formation of self-insurance groups in the past.

I will not take the time now to spell out all of the details of the legislative history accompanying the original Risk Retention Act, which is carefully explained in Senate Report No. 98-172, accompanying S. 1046. I will, however, comment on it briefly. the Risk Retention Act permits self insurance cooperatives called "risk retention groups" to insure the product liability risks of its member. The Senate report stated unambiguously that the definition of "product liability" in the act served to define the coverage that may be provided by a risk retention group" and to "delineate[s] the boundaries" of the exemption from State law.

Notwithstanding this clear statement of congressional intent, some disputes have arisen over whether Federal or State law definitions of "product liability" control the scope of the coverage that may be provided by a risk retention group. This has resulted in litigation in two Federal courts and a number of inquiries by State regulators.

S. 1046 is intended to remove any legal doubt that the product liability risks specified in the Risk Retention Act define the scope of coverage that risk retention groups may insure. I believe that this clarification will help avoid needless litigation regarding the scope of authorized coverage and will eliminate any existing uncertainty that could discourage groups from utilizing the authority granted under the act. This amendment also clarifies that nothing in the act or its structure authorizes any State, including a licensing State, to restrict or expand the coverages a group may provide. It is intended that a group will qualify, regardless of the features of its program, if its primary activity consists of assuming and spreading any portion of the legal liability of its members for their product liability risk exposure.

Mr. President, I appreciate the concern of some State insurance regulators that the Risk Retention Act not be used as a vehicle to avoid legitimate State regulation of automobile, health, life, and other lines of insurance. At the same time, however, insurance regulators should not construe this law—intended to simplify the regulation of the self-insurance of product liability risks—so narrowly that its purposes and objectives are defeated.

The amendment contained in S. 1046 will end debate over the scope of insurance coverage that risk retention groups and purchasing groups are authorized to offer to their members. It will provide guidance to those forming such groups, as well as to insurance regulators.

For these reasons, and to assure the full implementation of the Risk Retention Act, I urge the Senate to pass S. 1046.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 1046

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2(b) of the Product Liability Risk Retention Act of 1981 (15 U.S.C. 3901(b)) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to affect either the tort law or the law govering the interpretation of insurance contracts of any State, and the definitions of product liability and product liability insurance under any State law shall not be applied for the purposes of this Act, including recognition or qualification of risk retention groups or purchasing groups.".

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the final item I have on today's calendar of routine matters is S. 1146, Calendar Order No. 384. Is the minority leader prepared to approve that matter?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the matter has been cleared.

AVIATION DRUG-TRAFFICKING CONTROL ACT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate S. 1146.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1146) to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to provide for the revocation of the airman certificates and for additional penalties for the transportation by aircraft of controlled substances, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert:

That this Act may be cited as the "Aviation Drug-Trafficking Control Act."

SEC. 2. (a) Section 609 of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1429) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"TRANSPORTATION, DISTRIBUTION, OR OTHER ACTIVITIES RELATED TO CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES

"(c)(1) The Administrator shall issue an order revoking the airman certificates of any person upon conviction of such person for any felony violation of a State or Federal law relating to a controlled substance (other than a law relating to simple possession of a controlled substance) if the Administrator determines that (A) an aircraft was used in connection with the commission of the offense and (B) such person knowingly either served as an airman in connection with the offense or was on board the aircraft in connection with the offense.

"(2) The Administrator shall issue an order revoking the airman certificates of any person if the Administrator determines that—

"(A) the airman has engaged in an activity which he knew, or had reasonable cause to know, was intended to distribute, import, or export a controlled substance;

"(B) an aircraft was used in such activity or to facilitate such activity;

"(C) the airman either served as an airman in connection with such activity or was on board the aircraft in connection with such activity;

"(D) the controlled substance was not part of the legitimate official supplies of such aircraft;

"(E) the controlled substance was not part of the cargo entered in the manifest of an aircraft engaged in the usual course of business of a common or contract carrier certificated to carry cargo under the provisions of this Act; and

"(F) the airman (or his employer) was not authorized to distribute, import, or export (as the case may be) the controlled substance under any State or Federal law or under the authority of any State or Federal agency.

For the purpose of subparagraph (F) of this paragraph, if the Administrator determines that the airman (or his employer) was not registered to distribute, import, or export (as the case may be) the controlled substance in question pursuant to section 303 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 823) or section 1007 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 957), the burden of proof shall be on the airman to establish that he (or his employer) was authorized to distribute, import, or export (as the case may be) such controlled substance under any State or Federal law or under the authority of any State or Federal agency. This paragraph is intended to reach activity occurring within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, or without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, or both.

"(3) Prior to revoking an airman certificate under this subsection, the Administrator shall advise the holder thereof of the charges or any reasons relied upon by the Administrator for his proposed action and shall provide the holder of such certificate an opportunity to answer any charges and be heard as to why such certificate should not be revoked. Any person whose certificate is revoked by the Administrator pursuant to this subsection may appeal the Administrator's order to the Board and the Board shall, after notice and a hearing on the record, affirm, amend, modify, or reverse the Administrator's order. In the conduct of its hearings, the Board shall not be bound by findings of fact of the Administrator. The filing of an appeal with the Board shall stay the effectiveness of the Administrator's order unless the Administrator advises the Board that safety in air commerce or air transportation requires the immediate effectiveness of his order, in which event the order shall remain effective and the Board shall finally dispose of the appeal within 60 days after being so advised by the Administrator. A person whose certificate is revoked by the Board's order may obtain judicial review of said order under the provisions of section 1006. The filing of an application for such judicial review shall not stay the effectiveness of the Board's order.

"(4) In any proceeding pursuant to this subsection, the findings of an appropriate State or Federal court as to any element of proof required by this subsection shall be conclusive and neither the Administrator nor the Board shall have the authority to review such issue.

"(5) In any proceeding pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection—

"(A) neither the Administrator nor the Board shall be required, or have the authority, to determine if any activity constitutes a violation of any State or Federal law relating to a controlled substance;

"(B) no part of the record of such proceeding shall be admitted as evidence in any State or Federal criminal proceeding; and

"(C) neither the Administrator nor the Board shall have the authority to revoke the airman certificate of any person who has been the subject of a criminal indictment or information concerning the activity related to a controlled substance and who has been acquitted in a State or Federal court of all charges related to such activity.

"(6) For the purposes of this subsection, the terms 'controlled substance' and 'distribute' shall have the same meaning given such terms by section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802) and the terms 'import' and 'export' shall have the same meaning given such terms by section 1001 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 951).".

(b) That portion of the table of contents contained in the first section of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 which appears under the side heading:

"Sec. 609. Amendment, suspension, and revocation of certificates."

is amended by adding at the end thereof:

"(c) Transportation, distribution, or other activity related to controlled substances.".

SEC. 3. Section 602(b) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1422(b)) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(b)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the Administrator shall not issue an airman certificate to any person whose airman certificate has been revoked pursuant to subsection (c) of section 609 of this title during the 5-year period beginning on the date of such revocation.

"(B) The Administrator may issue an airman certificate to any such person before the end of such 5-year period (but not before the end of the 1-year period beginning on the date of such revocation) if, in addition to the findings required by paragraph (1), the Administrator determines (i) that revocation of the certificate for such 5-year period would be excessive considering the nature of the offense or the act committed and the burden which revocation places on such person, or (ii) that revocation of the certificate for such 5-year period would not be in the public interest. The determinations under clauses (i) and (ii) of the preceding sentence shall be within the discretion of the Administrator and any such determination or failure to make such a determination shall not be subject to administrative or judicial review.

"(C) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this paragraph, in any case in which the Administrator has revoked the airman certificate of any person pursuant to section 601(c) (1) or (2) as a result of any activity related to a controlled substance and such person is subsequently acquitted of all charges related to such activity in any criminal indictment or information arising from such activity, the Administrator shall issue a certificate to such person if such person is otherwise qualified to serve as an airman under the provisions of this Act.".

SEC. 4. Section 501(e) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1401(e)) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(e)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) The Administrator shall issue an order revoking the certificate of registration issued to an owner under this section for an aircraft and each other certificate of registration held by such owner under this section, if the Administrator determines that—

"(i) such aircraft has been used in an activity, or to facilitate an activity that is a felony violation of any State or Federal law relating to a controlled substance (other than any law relating to simple possession of a controlled substance); and

"(ii) the use of the aircraft was permitted by such owner who knew, or had reasonable cause to know, that the aircraft was intended to be used for activity described in clause (i) of this subparagraph.

For purposes of this paragraph, an owner of an aircraft who is not an individual shall be considered to know, or to have reasonable cause to know, the intended use of an aircraft only if a majority of the individuals who control such owner or who are involved in forming the major policy of such owner knew, or had reasonable cause to have known, of such intended use.

"(B) Prior to revoking any certificate of registration under this subsection the Administrator shall advise the holder thereof of the charges or any reasons relied upon by the Administrator for his proposed action and shall provide the holder of the certificate of registration an opportunity to answer any charges and be heard as to why such certificate should not be revoked. Any person whose certificate of registration is revoked by the Administrator pursuant to this subsection may appeal the Administrator's order to the Board and the Board shall, after notice and a hearing on the record, affirm, amend, modify, or reverse the Administrator's order. In the conduct of its hearings, the Board shall not be bound by findings of fact of the Administrator. The filing of an appeal with the Board shall stay the effectiveness of the Administrator's order unless the Administrator advises the Board that safety in air commerce or air transportation requires the immediate effectiveness of his order, in which event the order shall remain effective and the Board shall finally dispose of the appeal within 60 days after being so advised by the Administrator. The person whose certificate of registration is revoked by the Board's order may obtain judicial review of said order under the provision of section 1006. The filing of an application for such judicial review shall not stay the effectiveness of Board's order.

"(C) In any proceeding under this paragraph—

"(i) the term 'controlled substance' shall have the same meaning given such term by section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802);

"(ii) no part of the record of such proceeding shall be admitted as evidence in any State or Federal criminal proceeding;

"(iii) neither the Administrator nor the Board shall have the authority to revoke any certificate of registration if the owner of such aircraft has been the subject of a criminal indictment or information concerning the alleged illegal activity related to a controlled substance and has been acquitted in a State or Federal court of all such charges; and

"(iv) the findings of an appropriate State or Federal court as to any element of proof required by such paragraph shall be conclusive and neither the Administrator nor the Board shall have the authority to review such issue.

"(D) Notwithstanding any other provision of this paragraph, in any case in which the Administrator has revoked the certificate of registration of any person as a result of any activity related to controlled substance and such person is subsequently acquitted of all charges related to such activity in any criminal indictment or information arising from such activity, the Administrator shall issue a certificate of registration to such person if such person is otherwise qualified for such a certificate under the provision of this Act.

"(E) Except as provided in subparagraph (F), the Administrator shall not issue a certificate of registration to any person who has had a certificate revoked pursuant to subparagraph (A) of this paragraph during the 5-year period beginning on the date of such revocation.

"(F) The Administrator may issue a certificate of registration for an aircraft to any such person before the end of such 5-year period (but not before the end of the 1-year period beginning on the date of such revocation) if the Administrator determines that such aircraft is otherwise eligible for registration under this section and (i) that revocation of the certificate for such 5-year period would be excessive considering the nature of the offense or the act committed and the burden which revocation places on such person, or (ii) that revocation of the certificate for such 5-year period would not be in the public interest. The determinations under clauses (i) and (ii) of the preceding sentence shall be within the discretion of the Administrator and any such determination or failure to make such a determination shall not be subject to administrative or judicial review.".

SEC. 5. Section 902(b) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. 1472(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "(b) Any person who" and inserting in lieu thereof "(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person who";

(2) by striking out "uses or attempts to use" and inserting in lieu thereof "sells, uses, attempts to use, or possesses with the intent to use"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) Any person who violates paragraph (1) of this subsection (other than by selling a fraudulent certificate) with the intent to commit any act prohibited by any State or Federal felony law relating to controlled substances (other than any law relating to simple possession of a controlled substance) shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $25,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or both.

"(B) Any person who violates paragraph (1) of this subsection by selling a fraudulent certificate with the knowledge that the purchaser intends to use such certificate in connection with any act prohibited by any State or Federal felony law relating to controlled substances (other than any law relating to simple possession of a controlled substance) shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $25,000 or to imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or both.

"(C) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'controlled substance' has the meaning given such term by section 102(6) of the Controlled Substances Act.".

SEC. 6. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall apply with respect to acts and violations occurring after the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, is the amendment a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a complete substitute.

Mr. BAKER. Reported by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The leader is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, on April 26, I introduced, along with Senators DECONCINI and DOMENICI, S. 1146, the Aviation Drug-Trafficking Control Act. I introduced the bill to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 because I believed that the current civil penalty of $1,000 fine and a 1-year suspension of a pilot's certificate, which the FAA may impose upon pilots convicted for illegal drug trafficking, was not sufficient.

The statistics tell an alarming story. According to the Drug Enforcement Agency estimates, in 1981, 50 percent of the cocaine, 35 percent of the marijuana, 75 percent of Southwest Asian heroin, and 80 percent of the dangerous drugs entering the United States are smuggled in by air. According to the Customs Service, 1.3 million pounds of drugs—cocaine, marijuana, heroin, mathaqualone, and others—will enter the country by private aircraft this year. Ninety percent of that will come across our southern border.

Not surprisingly, given the conditions under which small private aircraft used to smuggle drugs are flown, many crash for lack of fuel, because they are overloaded, or because their pilots take off from or attempt to land on unmarked, deserted airfields. The FAA informs me that between 1980 and 1982 there have been 491 aircraft crashes in which drugs had been on board. Drugs aside, it seems to me have a very serious aviation safety problem here as well.

Drug smuggling is a pernicious threat. It creates crime, corrosive values, and supports an underground, untaxed economy, which threatens legitimate business and enterprise. It also of course destroys thousands of lives every year.

I therefore introduced the Aviation Drug-Trafficking Control Act, which is designed to bring the Federal Aviation Administration into the fight against drug smuggling. S. 1146 would require revocation of an airman's certificate for 5 years if the holder is convicted of violating any law relating to controlled substances—other than a law relating to simple possession—and the FAA Administrator determines that the certificate holder knowingly served as an airman in connection with the violation.

The bill also empowers the Administrator to revoke an airman's certificate for up to 5 years but not less than 1 if he determines that the holder knowingly served as an airman in connection with the transportation of a controlled substance, even if the holder was not previously convicted for a drug-related offense.

Before an airman's certificate could be revoked, however, the holder must be given notice and an opportunity to answer the charges. He would also have the right of appeal to the courts. The provision is consistent with numerous judicial decisions which have held that a license is a privilege and not a right, and may therefore be revoked when it has been abused. Current law gives the Administrator the authority to suspend or revoke a license for safety violations, and, as demonstrated by the numerous drug-related crashes, smuggling drugs by air is clearly dangerous.

The bill also gives the Administrator the authority to revoke a certificate of registration for up to 5 years but not less than 1 if he determines that the owner has knowingly permitted the aircraft to be used to transport a controlled substance.

Although I do not consider the Federal Aviation Administration a Drug Enforcement Agency, we have given the FAA responsibility to license and certify airmen and aircraft. The FAA can and should, I believe, use its licensing authority to help make certain that aircraft are not employed to smuggle drugs. This is an authority and responsibility we have already given the Coast Guard; there is no reason not to give the same task to the FAA, particularly when drug trafficking by air is so serious today.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to thank Senator KASSEBAUM for her diligent work in putting S. 1146 in the form it is today. She scheduled early hearings and moved the bill expeditiously through the Commerce Committee. I would also like to thank the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service for doing, at my request, an incisive legal analysis of S. 1146, which found no due process problems with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that was the last of the items I have in my folder for action routinely. I thank the minority leader and other Senators. I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, would not it be well if we, before passing a bill by unanimous consent, move it to third reading?

Mr. BAKER. It would be. We have not been doing that lately. I hope that the Parliamentarian would prompt the Chair to call for third reading in case there are amendments and we can proceed in that way.

Mr. BYRD. Yes. A Senator might wish to have a vote on third reading. I do not foresee it. But it seems to me, for future generations which I hope will research the RECORD of this generation, they might find it useful.

Mr. BAKER. There are days, Mr. President, when I hope future generations cannot find the RECORD.

Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. We are in morning business still, I believe. I yield the floor.

BASE FOR FERRYING ARMS TO EL SALVADOR FOUND IN NICARAGUA

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise to place in the RECORD a news report which my colleagues may have missed when it first ran. Many of my colleagues, I suspect, have encountered skepticism from constituents as to the truth and accuracy of allegations that Nicaraguan involvement and terrorism has been directed against the Government and the people of El Salvador.

I have encountered such skepticism, Mr. President, not only among constituents, but even among a few recently arrived members of the news media during my recent trip to Central America. This is not surprising because, as the report which I seek to have printed in the RECORD states, "U.S. officials have consistently refused to provide evidence of the Nicaragua-to-El Salvador arms flow, contending it would compromise intelligence sources."

Indeed, this report is itself the work of investigative reporters. To quote the report: "No U.S. officials were interviewed in connection with this report."

Mr. President, the report I am inserting in the RECORD today is one by Sam Dillon of the Knight-Ridder News Service that ran on Thursday, September 22, 1983, in the Washington Post. Mr. Dillon's report is by no means an isolated piece of evidence, but is notable for the clarity for which it documents the complicity of the Sandinista regime in arming and directing the terrorist activities within El Salvador.

The report details a raid against "A radio-equipped warehouse and boat facility, disguised as a fishing cooperative on an island in northwest Nicaragua," which "has served for 3 years as a transshipment point for smuggling arms to El Salvador." That, despite the fact that "the Nicaraguan Government denies the operation."

Mr. President, this report is one more piece of evidence in the undeniable case that has been made that the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua intends and is, in fact, actively seeking to bring about "revolution without boundaries."

The chosen means of the Sandinistas for exporting their revolution to neighbors who do not wish to share it is to persuade them by violence, terrorism, and subversion.

Mr. President, it is my hope that this additional piece of evidence will be useful to my colleagues in answering skeptics and persuading them to see the unhappy truth, using reason and facts rather than violence to persuade.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report by Mr. Dillon be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BASE FOR FERRYING ARMS TO EL SALVADOR FOUND IN NICARAGUA

(By Sam Dillon)

ESTERO DE PADRE RAMOS, NICARAGUA.—A radio-equipped warehouse and boat facility, disguised as a fishing cooperative on an island to northwestern Nicaragua, has served for three years as a transshipment point for smuggling arms to El Salvador, numerous residents here say.

Although the Nicaraguan government denies the operation, fishermen and others in several tiny coastal hamlets nearby say that soldiers in military vehicles regularly trucked wooden boxes to the water's edge and loaded them in motor-powered launches bound for El Salvador's coast 40 miles to the north.

Fishermen report occasionally finding similar wooden boxes containing foot-long "bazookas"—presumably mortar shells or similar munitions—on shore north of the mouth of this estuary where the boats battle the surf to enter the Pacific Ocean.

A 14-boat fleet, including half a dozen large dugout canoes that can carry thousands of pounds of cargo, has been involved in the operation, residents say, with regular departures at two-week intervals.

The Reagan administration has contended since soon after the inauguration in 1981 that Nicaragua's Sandinista government was supplying arms to the Salvadoran guerrillas. But U.S. officials have consistently refused to provide evidence of the Nicaragua-to-El Salvador arms flow, contending it would compromise intelligence sources. Without the proof, critics have been skeptical of the U.S. allegations.

No U.S. officials were interviewed in connection with this report.

Anti-Sandinista "counterrevolutionaries" attacked the island Sept. 14, blowing up the warehouse and three small boats. A communique from the Honduran-based, U.S.-financed Nicaraguan Democratic Force (FDN) claimed responsibility, calling the site "an important center of logistical supply" for Salvadoran guerrillas.

Sandinista authorities claimed the FDN had attacked the state-financed Mario Carrillo fishing cooperative. Barricada, the official newspaper, condemned the attack as "irrational criminality."

Defense Ministry officials, asked about the details in this account, insisted that no military installation had existed on the island.

Officials in the Fisheries Ministry and the National Development Bank said Monday, however, that the Mario Carrillo cooperative is not on the island and that no state-recognized cooperative operates in this region.

Indeed, in two visits to La Concha, the swampy island base said by the government to house the Mario Carrillo cooperative, reporters found no evidence the facility was ever used for fishing.

Instead, reporters found a Sandinista Army banner, a makeshift target with dozens of spent rifle shell casings, a radio antenna and three long, empty wooden boxes amid the ruins of the tin-roofed warehouse destroyed in the FDN attack.

Fishermen and other residents who live in huts lining this tangled estuary, and also small farmers and fishermen in Jiquilillo, Padre Ramos, Venecia and other nearby hamlets, said La Concha island was not a fishing cooperative but a "military base."

The island has been off limits to local residents for three years, they said. Reporters were granted government permission to visit the island last week to report the FDN attack.

Some area residents were hesitant to discuss the La Concha activity, calling it a "delicate situation," but others openly talked with reporters.

"I don't get involved in politics, but everyone around here knows they are carrying the arms to El Salvador," said the wife of a Padre Ramos fisherman.

Several residents said they have seen what they described as the arms trafficking in La Concha, and had learned other details through casual conversations with locals involved in the smuggling forays.

To avert potential difficulty for them, names of residents who talked about the arms-trafficking have been omitted.

A shotgun-toting guard who lives 200 yards across from La Concha, Vicente Perez Castellon, fired into the air to warn off reporters landing on the island in a rented launch. When presented with a government letter of authorization, however, he consented to show reporters around the destroyed facility. He maintained it was a fishing cooperative.

Perez Castellon said the facility's radio has been used to monitor Fisheries Ministry radio reports on fishing conditions. A Fisheries Ministry official in Managua said the ministry does not broadcast fishing reports and knew of no fishing cooperatives equipped with two-way radios.

Fishermen said departure of the arms shipments depended on weather and surf conditions, as well as reports of "vigilance" conditions in the Gulf of Fonseca, which separates Nicaragua from El Salvador. Salvadoran and Honduran gunboats patrol the 20-mile wide gulf.

Soviet-Bloc weapons used by the Sandinista Army have never appeared in the hands of Salvadoran rebels, and there was no indication of where the arms delivered to La Concha had originated.

Neither was there any indication here of how high within the Sandinista military hierarchy the involvement extended.

Nicaraguan officials have never publicly admitted involvement in the smuggling of arms to El Salvador.

The fishermen said that weeks after the Sandinista-led ouster of president Anastasio Somoza in 1979, military men came to the village looking for experienced smugglers.

Beginning soon thereafter, Andres Lopez, identified by several residents as a smuggler who lived in Venecia on the northern shore of the estuary, emerged as the local leader of the operation, the fishermen said.

Then La Concha's guard, Perez Castellon, began to warn local residents away from the island and several unusually large launches appeared for the first time at the facility, residents said.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

WHY THE NUCLEAR FREEZE EXPRESSES THE WILL OF THIS DEMOCRACY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, we now have a solid majority of the people of this country in favor of a nuclear freeze. Repeated statewide referenda all over the United States, reliable polls, town meetings and virtually every other kind of public expression of opinion has consistently and overwhelmingly confirmed the widespread support for action to stop the nuclear arms race and to stop it entirely. Six of the seven candidates for the Democratic nomination for President not only unanimously favor the nuclear freeze but have made it a leading and conspicuous part of their campaigns. Would they do this if they were not convinced that a vast majority of American citizens favored this method of stopping the arms race?

Recently, the chairman of the Democratic Party, Charles Manatt, has made the freeze a Democratic Party position. It is noteworthy that Manatt put our party in this position after the Russians had shot down the unarmed Korean jetliner and sent 61 American citizens to their deaths. Democrats have universally condemned this savage action by the Soviet Union. Why have Democrats not followed the lead of those who argue that this heinous act by the Soviets show that we cannot make any agreement with them? We cannot trust them, so how can we negotiate any arms agreement with them? The answer: Democrats, like Republicans, never have trusted the Russians. We negotiate an agreement we can verify. We know that they will cheat on an agreement if they can get away with it. Our job is to prevent their getting away with it. And that is the task of verification.

But support for the freeze is not simply a party matter. In Wisconsin, the freeze we adopted last September by an overwhelming vote was supported by every leading Republican in the State. And, with few exceptions, rank and file Republican support for the freeze has generally been the rule throughout the country.

In the House of Representatives, the nuclear freeze lost by a single vote in 1982, but when it came up for a vote in 1983, it passed by a smashing 2 to 1 margin with surprisingly strong Republican support that came to the freeze in spite of opposition by a popular Republican President.

In the past several years, I cannot recall any political movement that has had such wide and strong popular support in this country in the face of opposition by the President of the United States and by most of those in the media who express an opinion on the subject. For example, the New York Times opposes the freeze. So does the Washington Post. George Will, Jack Kilpatrick, Bill Safire, Bill Buckley, Evans and Novak—all widely syndicated columnists—oppose the freeze with considerable vigor and frequency. And what widely read or heard columnists favor the freeze? If any do, they do a great job of keeping that support for the freeze a carefully guarded secret. In fact, nowhere in the media has the fulsome opposition to the freeze been matched by any significant expression of support.

With the latest turbulent collapse in United States-Soviet relations—the shooting down of an unarmed Korean jet with 61 American citizens aboard by deliberate Soviet attack—many have said that is the end of the freeze. You can kiss it goodby. It is dead. And why do they say the freeze is dead? Because it is said the American people will now at last recognize what we are up against in the Soviet Union—the deliberate lying, the cheating, the brutal disregard of the sanctity of human life. So they say this will kill the freeze because the freeze requires a treaty, an agreement with the Soviet Union, and we now know the Soviets will not keep such an agreement, and this shooting down of the unarmed jet plus the lying coverup proves it.

But, Mr. President, does this latest experience prove anything the American people did not already know? We know the Russians have little regard for human life. We know they lie and cheat. We know they live in international relations by that most vicious of creeds that the end justifies the means—any means, no matter how cruel or inhuman. Most of us have always known this. But should this preclude a treaty? No, indeed. It simply reinforces the necessity for verification procedures in any treaty that will alert us to any cheating by the Soviets. How will verification do that job? In two ways:

First, if they cheat, we can renounce the treaty and act in our defense.

Second, if they know we can detect any cheating, they are much more likely to observe the treaty as they have done with the test ban treaty since its adoption 9 years ago in 1974.

Finally, President Reagan—who opposes the freeze and has forcefully led the attack on the Soviets for shooting down the Korean jet—has continued to insist on negotiations with the Soviets not on the freeze but on other arms control agreements. Presumably, the President would recommend a treaty with the Russians on other arms control limits in spite of the Soviet conduct he vigorously condemns. If the President would agree to any kind of arms control limitation with the U.S.S.R.—would not the same you-cannot-trust-the-Russians arguments apply to those limited United States-Soviet arms treaties as they would to a comprehensive overall nuclear freeze? Of course, they would. The freeze offers no basic verification problem that is not common to any arms control agreement.

GENOCIDE: MORE THAN MURDER

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the recent Korean airliner incident teaches by analogy an important lesson regarding the crime of genocide.

The barbaric destruction of flight 007 was not the act of an individual pilot acting on his own initiative, contrary to official orders. If it had been it would of course still be tragic, but would not be so likely to provoke lengthy and intense response from the international community.

In fact, however, the downing of that airliner was the result of Government directions—a settled Soviet policy which instructs its military to attack and destroy unarmed civilian aircraft which violate its air space. Therefore, international action is in order—to condemn this act and to prevent its recurrence in the future.

Similarly with regard to genocide, I would have my Senate colleagues note that genocide is typically not an individual's act. In its report on the International Genocide Convention, the Foreign Relations Committee of the 94th Congress noted that, and I quote: "It is unlikely that genocide could be committed without the explicit or implicit approval of the government of the country in which it occurred . . ." Therefore, Mr. President, international action to prevent it is in order.

Critics have argued that genocide is in effect nothing more than repeated murder, and as such should be dealt with by individual nations. Historical examples make it clear, however, that genocide and genocide-related acts invariably occur with the blessing of the sovereign bodies governing the territories involved. Genocide is, therefore, more than murder. I cannot overemphasize this point—genocide is more than mere murder. The scope of the acts involved and the complicity of public officials require more compelling moral and legal sanctions to punish and prevent genocide.

Those who criticize the Soviets' action in the Korean airliner incident would recognize that it was not simply an act of murder. Similarly, they ought to recognize that genocide is more than multiple murder, and that the International Genocide Convention represents a proper response to this crime. Lack of U.S. ratification has for too long weakened the moral and legal impact of this treaty; I urge my Senate colleagues to lend their advise and consent to ratification without delay.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary of the Senate proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TESTIMONY OF FORMER SENATOR ADLAI STEVENSON BEFORE THE SENATE GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, on August 14, 1983, my distinguished predecessor and good friend, Senator Adlai Stevenson, testified before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs on the issues of industrial policy and the creation of a cabinet-level Department of Trade.

He is extremely well qualified to speak on both subjects, and on their interrelationships. He was chairman of the Senate Banking Subcommittee on International Finance and was an early leader in the Senate on the subjects of trade and industrial policy.

His statement points out that "the aim of the industrial policy is to get the Government out of the market—and confine its actions to making the market function more smoothly." He argues forcefully and with his usual insight and intelligence for creation of a new Department of Industry and Trade "with the visible, central responsibility for export promotion and financing, import monitoring and relief, international investment policy, international trade negotiations, industrial and trade analyses, trade policy, and coordination and industrial policy." He focuses our attention where it should be focused—on taking actions designed to enhance our economic competitiveness at home and thoughout the world. With trade deficits that will soon be $100 billion or even more, we have no choice but to adopt that focus if we are to restore any realistic prospects for consistent, long-term economic growth.

Mr. President, I commend Senator Stevenson's testimony to all my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that the full text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF ADLAI E. STEVENSON

The merchandise trade deficit this year will approach $70 billion. Swollen imports have diplaced an estimated 1.5 million jobs. Much of the increased demand for imports can be traced to the dollar's recent appreciation against foreign currencies. But this should not obscure the fact that large and growing trade deficits were a disturbing feature of the U.S. economy even when the dollar was substantially undervalued in the late 1970s. The real causes are structural and reflect our inability to compete with countries which produce more efficiently and market more aggressively.

Trade in manufactures has gone from a surplus of $12.5 billion in 1980 to a deficit of an estimated $23 billion for 1983. The United States is losing its competitive edge in services. Agricultural exports—the mainstream of our trade performance—dropped 15 percent between 1980 and 1983. The current account is now also in deficit, dragged down by the trade deficit and declining returns on foreign investment. The trade deficit may reach $175 billion by 1990. Scarcely and industry does not suffer the erosion of its competitiveness in this fiercely competitive world lacking such fundamentals as a smoothly functioning monetary system and adequate credit facilities.

What happens to the U.S. economy, the locomotive force in the world economy, in the future depends largely on you—and the U.S. government.

I do not mean to imply that shortcomings in American management and labor—as well as the practices of foreign governments—are not in part responsible for the decline. They are, and there are limits to what government can do. Work rules and wage differentials (including American management's propensity to overcompensate itself) are a part of the problem. Short run planning horizons of American business are also responsible in part. But the subject of this hearing is the organization of the government—and the government can influence the policies of labor, management and foreign governments, as well as make its own.

The Committee has received numerous proposals to consolidate the government's responsibilities for trade. The awareness of the importance of trade policy is welcome. But in my judgment, none of the current proposals reflects the enormity of the challenge or responds adequately to the organizational advantages of our foreign competitors.

The proposals do not recognize that the ends of trade policy—access to foreign markets and protection from unfair foreign competition—avail us little if the goods and services we produce are not themselves competitive and responsive to changing demands in the world market. Trade policy and what is loosely called "industrial policy" are inseparable. Only together—and pursued by a central agency—can the nation's competitiveness be greatly improved. The United States does not lack the human, technological and natural resources. It lacks sound public policies. But what do we mean by "industrial policy"?

"Industrial policy" is commonly and erroneously equated with government intervention in the marketplace and the targeting of industries. If industrial policy is tantamount to such economic intervention by government, then the U.S. government probably already practices the most aggressive industrial policy of all the governments of all the industrial nations. In proportion to its GNP, probably no government resorts so freely and expensively to business assistance by loans, guarantees and grants, target and trigger prices, import quotas and tariffs, industry regulation, research assistance, tax expenditures and the like as the U.S. government.

The aim of industrial policy is to get the government out of the market—and confine its actions to making the market function more smoothly. A smoothly functioning market is the most efficient means by which to allocate resources. Industrial policy, therefore, propounds less, not more, intervention, less, not more, government. Its purpose is to give anti-trust, tax, education, job training, trade policy, all policies of government, an economic dimension. Its methods includes an institutional means by which government is sensitized to the economic implications of its decisions. The government has no agency to assess the implications of its actions, analyze sectoral trends and force attention to the economics of its decisions—leaving aside agencies with broad macroeconomic responsibilities, such as the Federal Reserve Board and the Council on Economic Advisors. The Commerce Department has some responsibilities for sectoral analysis, including those established by the Stevenson-Wydler Act, but they are unfulfilled and underutilized. It is in that sense of an industrial policy that makes the government more prudent in its policies and the marketplace more efficient, that I use the expression.

A new Department of Industry and Trade should be created with the visible, central responsibility for export promotion and financing, import monitoring and relief, international investment policy, international trade negotiations, industrial and trade analyses, trade policy and coordination and industrial policy. Its mission should be economic competitiveness. The Export Import Bank and Overseas Private Investment Corporation should be drawn in to the Department. The functions of the International Trade Commission, along with the trade functions of other agencies, should be transferred to the new Department. The Secretary of Agriculture has little power to bargain with other nations. He is a supplicant—in Europe, in Japan and most recently in Moscow. The Secretary of Industry and Trade, with ties to the Agriculture Department, should represent agriculture in trade negotiations. The Secretary should have the responsibilities of the U.S. Trade Representative and represent all the interests of the United States in trade negotiations.

The Department I envisage, and first recommended to you in 1979, would occupy the center of what is now a disordered stage. Of all the proposals before you, Senator Moynihan's comes closest to meet this prescription.

The United States, alone among the major industrial countries, doesn't already have a single unified government agency with authority and responsibility to advance its trading interests. Other nations, more dependent upon maximizing their share of international commerce, have long organized for successful and aggressive competition in the world. In the United States we have scattered responsibilities for trade among 25 agencies, more or less, with no central direction for trade or industrial policy. A framework for industrial policy doesn't even exist. Foreign competitors find an integrated approach to industry, trade and investment the key to economic success.

Far from assisting industry, the U.S. government has sometimes crippled it. U.S. exporters face a web of controls—anti-trust, anti-bribery, anti-boycott, export control, human rights, environmental review—and other restrictions which their counterparts abroad do not.

The absence of an advocate with the visibility and clout to fight for consistent policies and minimal bureaucratic restrictions has undermined U.S. export competitiveness in specific industries—and in all industries by creating a universal impression of unreliability. The world looks upon the U.S. as a market of first resort—and as a seller of last resort. Only a unified Department, with a clear mission and an institutional status to equal the Departments of State, Defense, Justice and Treasury will elevate the competitiveness of the economy to a level where it can hold its own in the muscular, sometimes fevered, process that produces public policy in the U.S.

The Commerce Department today is a bureaucratic orphanage for stray programs, with no clear mission and an irreparable reputation for ineffectuality. The USTR has a mission, but not the means to carry it out. The Department of Industry and Trade would be an agency for positive assistance. It should have the Economic Development Administration as an agency for industrial policy and the trade adjustment responsibilities of the Labor Department. It should have sectoral and analysts who can project the impact of government actions, spot sectoral crises before they get out of hand, and analyze global market trends for the benefit of decision makers in the private sector, as well as those in the public sector. It should also have the power to impose temporary protection from imports linked to real economic adjustment measures. Without this capacity, we are left to react politically with short term solutions that come too late.

The proposal I advocate recognizes that technology is the basis of our ability to compete. The new Department should have the primary responsibility for industrial innovation. The Department of Industry and Trade should include the Bureau of Standards and the Census Bureau, as well as the responsibilities for cooperative research and technological innovation established by the Stevenson-Wydler Act.

But even technologically superior products do not market themselves. Successful global competition also requires financing, marketing and servicing. The ExIm and OPIC lack the resources and clout to organize export and investment packages as attractive as those offered by competitors. These agencies should be in the new Department. And I urge you to devise a program, or linkage with the Agency for International Development, for mixed credits—combinations of market rate and concessionary financing—for the benefit of exports to lesser developed countries. This form of financing is widely used by European countries which recognize that it is in developing countries that the long term potentials for export growth are greatest.

The absence of a framework for coherent trade policy has produced an intensely political process for policy making. Our priorities in trade negotiations, as for textiles and citrus, are established by narrow political considerations, instead of an objective assessment of U.S. interests. Economic sanctions are imposed and lifted for reasons of short-range domestic, more than long-term international, politics. Farmers and companies, Caterpillar, for example, are punished for the transgressions of the Soviet Union. Similarly, the United States ends up practicing a costly and politicized, ad hoc industrial policy. IBM is punished for being too competitive; a motorcycle company is rewarded for being uncompetitive. I do not expect, or suggest, that policy be drained of politics. But this is too much.

No country practices free trade, and all countries by one means or another, the U.S. included, do practice trade protection. They all practice industrial policy. Other nations target industries. The United States does, too. But, leaving agriculture, aeronautics and defense industries aside, the United States generally does so in response to political pressures and for the benefit of declining industries. Our competitors also encourage growth industries. The difference in emphasis is our choice—not their fault.

Industrial policy and trade policy, including protection from competition, have competitiveness as their aim. Trade policy for the benefit of an industry should be accompanied by measures to encourage modernization and reorganization of the industry, as well as elimination of unfair or destructive foreign trade practices. But trade policy and industrial policy now work at cross purposes. Trade policy in the form of trade protection rarely compensates an industry for its injury and can relieve an industry of incentives to compete while always imposing higher costs on the economy. Thus, the trigger price mechanism increased the cost of steel to all users, including the troubled auto industry. It left the steel industry to invest in the oil industry and, next, to import basic steel products from lesser developed countries and Great Britain. Too little is done to modernize and rationalize the U.S. production of steel so the industry can compete without the subsidization of inefficient excess capacity, as the studies of the Office of Technology Assessment indicate is possible.

A more realistic anti-trust policy would have permitted the formation of efficient, competitive joint ventures for the production of steel products. Trade adjustment policy would have helped retrain structurally unemployed steel workers. And, if necessary to modernize the surviving elements of a rational steel industry, the government could have provided financing. However, the responsibilities for such policies are either nonexistent or scattered among agencies which do not include the one agency that might be said to have the responsibility for industry—the Commerce Department.

Hundreds of thousands of steel and auto workers remain out of work, displaced by high quality imports and new production technologies. Pressures mount for legislation to force the onshore assembly of foreign automobiles, for still more protection, and in violation of our GATT obligations. This will happen in industry after industry, unless actions are taken to anticipate change and respond positively to it. Representatives of the U.S. semi-conductor and computer industries are seeking trade protection. Japanese industry and government meanwhile move forward cooperatively to develop the artificial intelligence that could dominate "post industrial" economies based on knowledge and information processing.

With a Department of Industry and Trade, import relief could be linked to such positive measures as financing, training, infrastructure improvements and cooperative research. Trade and industrial policy would be integrated. With the Department as an advocate of industrial competitiveness, other Departments, such as Justice, might be brought to recognize that in the 1980s the structure of global, and not domestic, markets is what counts. The most concentrated industries are often subjected to the most intense foreign competition. In the name of competition the Justice Department has attacked some of our most dynamic competitors, such as IBM. The Department I propose would offer sound alternatives to both trade protection and anti-trust enforcement, such as cooperative research among small U.S. semiconductor or computer manufacturers so they can compete with domestic as well as foreign companies. It would give trade adjustment programs some "adjustment", drawing on sector analysis to guide the retraining of workers for new jobs.

The schools of the United States are saddled with responsibilities for racial integration, physical fitness, drivers education and other objectives, which, however desirable, compete with education. No agency relates education to the underlying economic imperatives of the individual and nation in a "post industrial" world. The humanities, sciences, languages are underserved, and yet human skills and knowledge will animate the economy far more so in the future than in the past. Other nations understand this.

Future administrations, less confident of the market's magic, may settle on policies that affirmatively help industry meet the competition, as an alternative to protection. That, it seems to me, ought to be the generalized aim of public policy. At least we should not perpetuate an organization of government which tends to politicize choices and confine them to policies of protection or free trade. Protectionism is a dangerously inefficient way of allocating resources, but free trade exists only in theory. The new Department would adapt policy to changing economic and political realities. Its mandate would be competitiveness. Its responsibilities would include the means to defeat foreign competition, and not just protect domestic losers.

The proliferation of industrial policies in the world raises profound problems for the post-World War II trading system and, in particular GATT and its subsidies code. As trade barriers have come down, competition has shifted to export subsidies and aggressive industrial policies. Export subsidies are regulated with some effect—but not industrial policies. At the same time a new Department was helping to arm the U.S. for economic competition, it should be negotiating from strength for reciprocity and fairness. The U.S. government, with trade and industrial responsibilities scattered, can neither make policy coherently—nor enforce it. It does not negotiate from strength. Rules are needed to govern industrial policy. The GATT should be made to involve more nations. And the U.S. should lead—from strength.

It has been argued that a Trade Representative in the White House has access to the President and, therefore, authority in negotiations. But our experience proves too well that access to carrots—such as export financing—and sticks—such as import protection—are more important than the location of the Trade Representative's office. U.S. trade negotiators lack the means for both retaliation and aggressive competition. A billion dollar ExIm war chest within the reach of our negotiators would give them additional credibility in negotiations for a reduction of export subsidies. Bargaining chips play a role in the debate over arms control, but receive curiously little attention in the debate over trade negotiations. We keep the sticks, to mix the metaphors, in a locked closet.

The Department I envisage would have the authority and the power to negotiate for more access to investment and export opportunities abroad and an open, inclusive, trading system with enforceable rules. A Secretary of Industry and Trade would have more access to the President and far more authority than the Secretary of an old Commerce Department or the Secretary of an incomplete new Trade Department—or, for that matter, the present Trade Representative. Commercial interests would acquire a powerful advocate abroad and, perhaps as importantly, at home.

The policies of the U.S. government with respect to defense requirements, economic sanctions, exchange rates, taxation—and so on—get established with little attention to their effect on our trading interests. The organization of government reflects an historical indifference to overseas markets and the necessities of competition. The Departments of State and Defense and the National Security Council have been insensitive to the needs of U.S. industry. All the efforts to coordinate economic policy, at least from President Nixon's Council on International Economic Policy to President Reagan's interagency groups, have been unsuccessful. We end up with no trade policy, no industrial policy and little representation of our commercial interests in the establishment of fiscal, monetary and defense policies.

The aim of this proposal is to create a Department with power commensurate to its responsibility. The responsibility is the competitiveness of the United States. It would have power to represent our interests in trade negotiations, power to shape constructive domestic economic policies, power to fight for consistent trade and industrial policies and against restrictions that undermine our export competitiveness—and power to represent commercial interests in the formulation of policies not within its immediate responsibility. For the first time, the effectiveness representation of commercial interests in such matters as exchange rate stabilization and the imposition of economic sanctions would be possible.

The organization of the government for competition is not the complete answer. But sound trade and industrial policies would be possible, at last.

HELPING OUT THE ILLINOIS CONSUMER

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to express my strong support for S. 1882, introduced by my friend and colleague (Mr. PERCY) and myself on Friday, September 23, 1983.

This bill reaffirms the fact that Illinoisans do not want Algerian liquefied natural gas when it is priced at double the cost of available domestic supplies.

This bill revokes the import license for Algerian liquefied natural gas that enters the Midwestern market and distorts it. Under this bill, the import license of Trunkline LNG Gas Co. would be revoked for a period of 18 months to allow for a complete review. After this period, the Federal Government could reissue the license.

Currently, Algerian natural gas is liquefied, put into tankers, transported across the Atlantic, regasified in Louisiana, and shipped in pipelines to Illinois and other Midwestern States. Who pays for this expensive and unwanted gas? Homeowners and businesses in Decatur, Springfield, McLeansboro, and other southern and central Illinois towns.

How much more does this gas cost than other supplies? In 1982, the price of the liquefied natural gas, once it reached the American shore, was $5.82 per 1,000 cubic feet. By comparison, in 1982 the average wellhead price for domestic natural gas was $2.43 per 1,000 cubic feet. Why should we pay 139 percent more for overseas gas when almost 2 trillion cubic feet of gas, much of it gas that sells for $1 or less per 1,000 cubic feet, is available in the United States?

Concerned Members of the Senate and the House—liberal and conservative—Democrat and Republican—have protested this unfair trading practice to the Economic Regulatory Administration (ERA) and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) for more than a year. Our complaints have fallen on deaf ears.

On January 28, 1983, ERA and FERC ruled the Trunkline license was in order. This decision was contrary to the facts. First, the ruling claimed that the algerian gas was marketable yet the price figures I have mentioned indicate otherwise. Second, the ruling claimed that the liquefied natural gas had a reliable source of supply. However, in 1981, for example, the Algerian company Sonatrach held up delivery of the gas for more than a year while it renegotiated the contract upward. Finally, the ruling claimed that the ERA did not have the authority to revoke the import license. Yet it does.

I am not against foreign trade. I am, however, against importing unnecessary, unwanted gas at unbelievably high cost to the consumer.

Let us do a favor to American producers in Louisiana, Texas, and Oklahoma, whose natural gas markets have been crippled by imported liquefied natural gas. Let us do a favor to the people of Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, and Ohio, who are paying for gas they do not need.

I urge my colleagues to support our bill.

REACTION OF JAMES A. MARTIN, JR., TO THE DESTRUCTION OF KAL FLIGHT 007

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the entire country shared a sense of outrage and disgust over the downing of Korean Air Line flight 007. Fortunately, however, only a relatively few of us were forced to experience the personal despair and pain of losing a family member as a result of this Soviet atrocity.

Recently, I received a copy of a letter to President Reagan from one of my constituents, Mr. James A. Martin, Jr., of Belton, S.C., whose son, Billy Hong, was one of the unfortunate aboard KAL flight 007. Mr. Martin's correspondence presents his personal account of what the entire Korean Air Line incident meant to him and the immediate family of Billy Hong.

This emotional account gave me a fuller appreciation of the profound grief experienced by those who lost loved ones due to this reprehensible act. In order to share Mr. Martin's thoughts and feelings with my Senate colleagues and others, I ask unanimous consent that his letter to the President, along with his personal reaction to the incident, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 19, 1983.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PRESIDENT REAGAN: Recently, it was pointed out to me by a high ranking government official that the downing of Flight 007, a Korean passenger plane was a deliberate murderous act by Communist Russia. I believe this to be the truth.

My son Billy Hong, was among the 269 persons who were violently brought to their deaths when this barbarous act was carried out on orders from Soviet officials.

I am not fully qualified to belabor the political ramifications involved in punishing the Soviets for this crime. Neither am I qualified to recommend or propose various sanctions against the Soviet Union.

There is, however, one option I would like to propose that would serve to punish the Soviets and that is this: whenever and wherever possible, speak of and publish accounts of this cowardly and deliberate shooting down of an unarmed commercial airliner.

Attached to this letter is my personal account of what this reprehensible taking of human life meant to me and how it affected my family.

It is my hope that you will see that this is published nationally.

Respectfully,

JAMES A. MARTIN, Jr.

LEST WE FORGET

(By James Martin, Jr.)

My son, Billy Hong, was one of the 269 passengers aboard Flight 007, a Korean Jetliner. He perished when a Soviet fighter plane shot it down on August 31, 1983.

At a recent memorial for Billy, held at Bonnie Brae Golf Course in Greenville, South Carolina, nothing was said about this terrible tragedy serving any useful purpose. I doubt that any of the other services that mourned the loss of 269 people mentioned any useful purpose had been served.

Billy has been quoted as saying, "There is one thing that I know—you can not trust a Communist."

I submit to you that you can trust a Communist. They just proved, again, that they can be trusted to kill and to lie indiscriminately without remorse or conscience. Rest assured, given the opportunity, they will also take your life, more or the lives of your loved ones without looking back or offering an apology. Likewise, they will destroy the things that we hold dear in the American way of life. They have a magnificent philosophy which, in the case of the 007, went like this: shoot first, ask questions later; ignore the truths, admit nothing; lie, when caught red-handed; if all else fails, cry "spy" and blame the victims.

Wake up America before it is too late. Neither our lives nor our way of life means anything to this Soviet government, and they are set to destroy us completely anyway they can—and they will if we do not do something to stop them. Consider Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary and more of late, Afghanistan.

A few weeks ago when news of this tragedy burst onto the scene, Americans were shocked as the real truth about 007 began to unfurl. The nation and the world joined together to deplore this undeserved attack on a commercial jetliner. The entire world heard orders given to a Russian fighter-plane to shoot down the unarmed Korean jetliner. The world heard how the Russian fighter pilot complied and fired rockets into the helpless jetliner. The world heard the pilot say his mission was accomplished, the target was destroyed.

What the world did not hear were the screams and agony of those men, women and children aboard 007. How terrible for them to know they were doomed to die in a fiery furnace that would plunge into a concrete like Pacific Ocean for a watery grave. This infamous act was a deliberate, inhuman barbarous and murderous taking of human lives. It is difficult for us to understand how such an act could be consummated without remorse or regard for defenseless human beings.

Our family, as well as families across the nation and abroad, were totally struck dumb. We could not believe what we were being told. It simply could not be happening to us—but it was and there was no escaping the horrible truth of it. We felt helpless, unable to come to grips with the death of a loved one in such an abrupt and violent manner. There was no way to strike back at the Godless power that snuffed out the lives of our loved ones so matter of factly and quickly. Many of us were overcome with sadness and remorse. There was not even a body over which to grieve.

In a few weeks, news of the Flight 007 tragedy will have abated and this horrendous nightmare will take its place in history. Other news items will claim the headlines and many people will forget Flight 007. Unfortunately, many families will not or cannot forget 007 because their loss has been too personal and permanent. We, nor our government, can afford to forget this atrocity by the Soviet Union on innocent American citizens.

Billy's young wife, Joy, has been very sad but brave, struggling to face up to new responsibilities. The children do not quite realize the finality of their father's absence but inevitably, they must.

Bill's birthday is December 25, a day he picked for his American birthday because it was a happy day. Of course, it is the same day many celebrate a most special birthday. Billy will not celebrate Christmas with us this year. Joy, his wife, will be with us and so will the children but Billy will be absent—absent forever because of Soviet Russia's atrocities.

Wake up America lest you too celebrate Christmas without a loved one.

Wake up America lest you not be allowed to celebrate Christmas at all.

THE DEATH OF SENATOR HENRY M. JACKSON

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently, the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Chili, Miguel Schweitzer; and His Excellency Gabriel Manueco, Ambassador of Spain, sent communications to Vice President GEORGE BUSH, expressing their sorrow over the death of my good friend and colleague, Senator Henry M. Jackson.

I ask unanimous consent that these kind remarks from these two foreign dignitaries be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SANTIAGO, CHILE,
September 2, 1983

His Excellency Mr. GEORGE BUSH,
Vice President of the United States of America, Capitol Hill, Washington D.C.:

In your capacity as Chairman of the Senate, please receive our most sincere condolences on the passing away of Senator Henry Jackson, whose devotion to peace and freedom was well known over the world.

Please accept, Your Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration and esteem.

MIGUEL SCHWEITZER,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of Chile.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
September 2, 1983.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
The Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is with my personal sorrow that I send to you and to the Senate of the Congress of the United States the heartfelt condolence on the untimely death of Senator Henry M. Jackson.

Reverently yours,

GABRIEL MANUECO.

TVA'S REPAYMENT TO THE U.S. TREASURY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is a rare occasion these days when I get the chance to report that a Federal Government program is funneling revenues back into the Federal Treasury. The stream does not usually flow back to its source.

But the Tennessee Valley Authority is a unique entity of the Federal Government. And I think it is appropriate, in this 50th year of TVA's successful operation, to recognize that at least one Government effort is giving the American taxpayers a tangible monetary return on their tax dollars.

This week the TVA has transferred $126.6 million as a return on the Federal appropriations invested in TVA power facilities prior to 1959.

Since 1959, when the TVA power program became self-financing, the citizens of the Tennessee Valley have put over $1.9 billion back into the U.S. Treasury. That already represents a substantial repayment on the $1.4 billion in Federal appropriations that went into the construction of TVA dams, reservoirs, and power stations—the building blocks of an infrastructure that helped move the Tennessee Valley from rural poverty into the modern age of industrial prosperity.

In fact, TVA's yearly payments to the Treasury are only a small part of the dividends received by U.S. citizens for their original investment in the TVA region.

TVA's installations and projects represent an asset for the American people that is worth literally billions of dollars. Those TVA plants, lands, and programs have helped create jobs and industrial growth in the TVA region, and they have been a major force behind the rapid ascent of the valley's living standard over the last half century.

It would be virtually impossible to measure the positive impact TVA has exerted not just on the economy of its region, but on the the national tax base and on the national economy.

TVA has been a leader in energy production and wise energy use, in fertilizer development, in environmental sensitivity, and in setting an example for effective Government initiatives in promoting economic development.

So this check and the many checks to follow are only symbols of the success of the unique TVA experiment. Like TVA itself, these yearly repayments are demonstrations. They prove conclusively that Federal dollars, if wisely spent, can serve as very productive seed money.

And they prove that this particular Government program has been self-supporting, beneficial to its region, and a major regional support for the economy of the country as a whole.

SECRETARY WATT'S CHARACTERIZATION OF THE COAL COMMISSION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, much has been said in recent days about Secretary Watt's characterization of the Coal Commission. I, too, am ashamed that a Cabinet member has debased his high office in such a way as to hurt and offend some Americans. Today, I received a copy of a letter written to Secretary Watt by a citizen of Shelburn, Mass., a relative of Dr. Richard Gordon, one of the commission members. The letter is a powerful expression of what people feel about Secretary Watt. I would like to read it to my colleagues, the letter is short.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1983.

Re Dr. Richard Gordon.

Mr. JAMES WATT,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WATT. You publicly hurt our family by referring to our cousin as a cripple. Dr. Gordon suffered Polio which incapacitated his right arm. You failed to mention he is a magna cum laude graduate of Dartmouth, as well as a Ph. D. from MIT, and a world-renown authority on the economics of coal.

We also strenuously object to your reference of the other committee members as "a woman, a black and two Jews". This was a slur on your entire committee.

Your unfortunate public remarks are exceeded only by either your lack of judgement in disposing of valuable coal resources or possibly some self-interest which might involve a conflict of interest.

By copy of this letter, we are asking President Reagan to remove you from office. We are also asking our Senators and Congressman to make a Congressional Recommendation to withdraw you from office.

We were not amused by your Golden Foot Award nor will we regret your departure from public office.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT ROSKIND, JR.

Mr. President, I think I speak for many of my colleagues when I say neither will we regret Secretary Watt's departure from office.

THE AUBURN UNIVERSITY SINGERS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it was just a short time ago that I attended the annual alumni dinner of the Washington Metropolitan Auburn Club. At that dinner, I was tremendously entertained, along with the rest of the audience, by the stunning performance of the Auburn University Singers. For the next few moments, Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues a few facts about the Auburn Singers.

The Auburn University Singers, who were here as a part of their tour of the Eastern United States, is a group of 32 singers and 12 instrumentalists, all of whom are students at Auburn University. All are not necessarily music students, indeed, they come from all sorts of academic programs across the Auburn campus. The group is under the direction of Dr. Thomas R. Smith.

Since being formed in 1973, the Auburn Singers have entertained people all across this country and abroad. In 1974, the group was a part of the Friendship Ambassadors program which toured Romania. In 1977, as a part of the same program, the University Singers toured Poland and the Soviet Union. Then, in 1979, the Partners of the Americas sponsored the group on a tour of Guatemala. Besides these overseas tours, the University Singers have performed all across the United States, appearing with celebrities such as Bob Hope, Roy Clark, and Alabama's own George "Goober" Lindsey.

This constant demand for the group's performance is indicative not only of their talent but also of the fine job continually done by their director, Dr. Thomas Smith. A native of Decatur, Ala., Dr. Smith holds degrees from Samford University, the University of Iowa, and the University of Colorado. He has done a tremendous job at Auburn, both as the director of the University Singers and as the University's Director of Choral Activities.

The Auburn University Singers are true ambassadors of good will for both their school and the entire State of Alabama. It was a pleasure for me to hear them perform here in Washington just a short a time back, just as it is a true pleasure for me to share their story with my colleagues here in the Senate.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. LESLIE S. WRIGHT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding leader who has recently retired from his post as president of Samford University in Birmingham, Dr. Leslie S. Wright.

It was a quarter of a century ago, September 1, 1958, when Leslie Wright became president of what was then known as Howard College. Prior to taking this position, Dr. Wright served for 3½ years as executive secretary of the Baptist Foundation of Alabama. He also had spent 4 years as a staff member in these very Halls of Congress, working as executive secretary to one of my predecessors, Senator Lister Hill.

Born in Birmingham in 1913, the son of a Baptist minister, Leslie Wright went on to receive two degrees from the University of Louisville. He also attended the University of Louisville Law School and did doctoral work at the University of Kentucky. He holds honorary degrees from five institutions, including Samford University.

When Leslie Wright became president of Howard College, few dared to dream of the progress the institution has made in the last 25 years. Under this leadership, a campus made up of only 8 buildings and valued at approxmiately $8 million has grown by 27 buildings, and now has a total replacement value of about $100 million.

Enrollment at Samford has risen to more than 4,000 students, double the figures of 1958. Still, perhaps a better indicator of the growth of the student body is the fact that Dr. Wright, in his 25 years as president, will have handed diplomas to as many students as had graduated from the institution from the time of its founding in 1840 until 1958.

Because of this growth, Samford University, besides being Alabama's largest privately supported institution of higher learning, is also the third largest Baptist institution in the country. Only Baylor University in Waco, Tex., and the University of Richmond in Virginia exceed Samford in enrollment.

If I could for a moment, Mr. President, I would like to list a few of the changes his college has experienced during Leslie Wright's dynamic tenure as president.

In 25 years, the faculty grew from 66 to 291.

In 25 years, the average faculty salary increased 491 percent.

In 25 years, the annual budget for the campus increased more than 1,200 percent.

In 25 years, the annual budget for scholarships increased more than 2,300 percent.

Lest you think all gains at Samford were financial ones, consider the following gains in Samford's academic program.

In 1965, Howard College became Samford University.

Graduate programs were reinstituted in 1965.

The divisions of business, education, pharmacy, graduate studies, and music were granted school status.

Divisions of adult education, paralegal studies, anesthesia, and cooperative education were started.

In 1961, the Cumberland School of Law was added to the academic program, bringing one of America's oldest and finest law schools to the Birmingham area.

In 25 years, the courses of study available to students have grown from 21 to more than 50.

Dr. Wright has been an outstanding leader for Samford University. Part of the reason has been the high regard in which he is held in business, civic, and community circles. Among the many outside activities he has engaged in have been his service as district governor and currently as director of Rotary International, two-time chairman of the Alabama Ethics Commission, and as trustee of Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky. The complete list of such activities would go on and on.

Leslie Wright has been a true servant of Alabama. Through his work at Samford, he has touched the lives of countless people, and he leaves behind a legacy which will benefit many yet to come.

I would be remiss if I did not mention his tennis ability. In fact, he has been my only tennis teacher. I seldom play but in days passed, he and I would team up as partners and beat many younger experts at the game. The way we did it was to turn the entire court over to him. In other words, he carried me.

Just as Howard College was left in good hands when the retiring president Harwell Davis was replaced by Leslie Wright, Samford University is now being left in the competent hands of Thomas E. Corts. Corts comes to Samford after 9 years as president of Wingate College in North Carolina.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the Birmingham Post-Herald, one about Dr. Wright and the other about Dr. Corts, as well as the text of a speech made by Dr. Ruric E. Wheeler, vice president for Academic Affairs of Samford University, to the Alabama Baptist Historical Society, be printed in the RECORD.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A GREAT INSTITUTION, A GREAT MAN

(By Dr. Ruric E. Wheeler, Vice President for Academic Affairs, Samford University)

"There was once a town in the heart of America where all life seemed to live in harmony with its surroundings. The town lay in the midst of a checkerboard of prosperous farms, with fields of grain and hillsides of orchards where, in spring, white clouds of bloom drifted above the green fields. . . . Then a strange blight crept over the area and everything began to change. Some evil spell had settled on he community. . . . Everywhere there was a shadow of death. . . . There was a strange stillness. The birds, for example, where had they gone? Many spoke of them, puzzled and disturbed. . . . The roadsides, once so attractive, were now lined with browned and withered vegetation as though swept by fire. . . . No witchcraft, no enemy action had silenced the rebirth of new life in this stricken world. The people had done it themselves."

Suppose we change the words of Rachel Carson's chilling environmental treatise, "Silent Spring," to read as follows:

"There once was a small college located in the heart of a prosperous eastern section of Birmingham where students laughed and played under the branches of old Sherman Oak, and faculty members brought down the plaster of Old Main with their scholarly discourses on everything from Greek to philosophy. In the spring, black and white clouds of commencement robes drifted down the aisles of old Woodlawn High, assuring the administration of another successful year.

"Then an unusual event happened in the life of this institution. A move was made to a hillside south of the city. Immediately, a blight began to cover this campus. The faculty members, for example, where had they gone? Some had taken jobs elsewhere, but many were still living in East Lake because, in order for the college to move to the new campus, small salary increases had finally changed to no salary increases. Few faculty members could affort to purchase homes in the affluent section south of Birmingham.

"The classrooms once filled with the fragrant aroma of blooming flowers were now infiltrated with chemistry fumes, because many departments were forced to share facilities since there were only three classroom buildings on the new campus.

"The smiling faces of students, once so noticeable, were replaced as the focus of attention by red clay footprints from the accumulation of mud that covered sidewalks on rainy days."

The writing of Rachael Carson is sad because there seems to be no satisfactory conclusion. In contrast it is good to report that, to the small college which has been described, there came in 1958 the "man of the hour" whose leadership began swiftly to eradicate the blight that had crept over this college. In fact, this small college is known today as a great university with its outstanding programs of excellence in a positive Christian environment.

Let's take a look at this man of the hour. Let's look at his many talents, his attitudes, his dedication, and see how these have been used to mold a great institution.

January 23, 1913, was a beautiful day in Birmingham, Alabama, at least for the members of the Ensley Baptist Church, for their pastor, Dr. A. K. Wright, had a new son. One particular family, the Wurtele family, was aware of the birth of this son because it was jokingly agreed that the daughter of this dedicated Baptist deacon, Lolla Catherine Wurtele, and the son of this pastor, Leslie Stephen Wright, would one day be man and wife. Today, as we contemplate the countless number of young people whose lives have been affected, influenced, molded by this couple, Les and Lolla, walking hand in hand through life, we are tempted to believe that this union must have been ordained.

Yes, one would have expected that a past Executive Secretary of the Trust Agency of the Alabama Baptist State Convention would be proficient in securing funds for development, but few dared to dream of that which has taken place in the last twenty-five years. But Leslie S. Wright did dream! Under his leadership a campus consisting of only eight buildings and valued at approximately eight million dollars has become a magnificent Georgian-Colonial academic community of more than thirty major structures with a replacement value of more than sixty million dollars. Let us call the roll:

Buchanan Hall (1958).

Reid Chapel, Burns Hall, Chapman Hall (1960).

Seibert Gymnasium (1961).

Married Student Apartments (1962).

Smith Hall (1962).

Pittman Hall (1963).

Stockham Cyclotron Building (1964).

Robinson Hall (1964).

Physical Plant Building (1964).

Physical Science Building (1966).

Women's Dorm C (1969).

Men's Dorm C (1969).

Dwight Beeson Hall (1970).

Enlargement of Ralph W. Beeson Student Center (1973).

Leslie S. Wright Fine Arts Center (1976).

Addition to Robinson Hall (1977).

Orlean Bullard Beeson Hall (1979).

Completion of Dwight Beeson Hall to house the School of Nursing (1982).

Completion of Ralph Beeson Hall for the English Department (1983).

One would have guessed that a former basketball player and basketball coach would be a winner. Yet who would have expected that he would hand diplomas to probably as many students in these twenty-five years as had formerly graduated from this institution since its founding in 1840. When the last student marches to the front in the August graduation, Dr. Wright will have handed diplomas to 16,932 students. The student body has more than doubled in twenty-five years, with 4,069 students enrolled in the fall of 1982; 222,830 students, the enrollment semester-by-semester since 1958, have been influenced by Dr. Wright's way of life, emphasizing patriotism, private enterprise, and the power, goodness, and love of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

No wonder that during the past twenty-five years, Samford University has been honored twenty times by Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge. President Wright, a member of the Freedoms Foundation Council of Trustees, has received, individually, three George Washington Honor Medals.

Twenty-five years ago many people in the Birmingham community still remembered Howard College as the small struggling school, where sometimes faculty members received paychecks on time but at other times salary checks were either two or three months late or were not available at all. This image had to be changed. This image was quickly changed because Leslie S. Wright became a community leader, loved and trusted by the Birmingham business and civic community. Here are a few of his areas of service:

Member of Citizens Supervisory Commission of Jefferson County.

Chairman of Jefferson County United Appeal Campaign.

President of Birmingham Symphony Association.

Chairman of Alabama Ethics Commission.

President of Alabama Educational Television Commission,

On the Board of Directors of:

(a) City Federal Savings and Loan Association,

(b) Alabama Partners of the Americas,

(c) Alabama Council on Economic Education,

(d) The Baptist Hospital Foundation.

He is a Director and member of the Executive Committee of the Jefferson County Community Chest-United Way and is a member of the Commission on Colleges of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools.

He has served as president of the Birmingham Rotary Club, past Governor of District 686 in Alabama, and serves now as a Director of Rotary International.

On and on we could list his many avenues of community service.

One would have expected a former administrative assistant to Senator Lister Hill to be a leader, but who would have guessed that he would exemplify the highest qualities of an educational engineer and statesman, becoming the dynamic, inspired, and perceptive leader to bring about the following changes:

1.In 1957–58 there were sixty-five faculty members at Howard College. This number has increased to 291 in twenty-five years, an increase of 341 percent.

2. In 1957–58 the average salary for faculty members was $4,680. This average salary increased by 14 percent in two years and 491 percent in twenty-five years.

3. The annual budget for the University increased from $1,255,000 to $16,417,000, an increase of 1,208 percent.

4. Annual gifts from the Cooperative Program increased from $225,000 to $2,253,000, an increase of 901 percent.

5. The annual budget for libraries increased from $45,790 to over $800,000, an increase of 1,647 percent.

6. The annual budget for scholarships increased from $57,867 to $1,400,000, an increase of 2,319 percent.

Consider now Samford's academic program. Progress here has kept stride with growth in other areas. Some of the major changes are as follows:

1. The pharmacy program was changed to a five-year program in 1959.

2. In 1961 the historic Cumberland School of Law was added to the Howard College program, bringing to the Brimingham area the rich tradition of one of America's oldest law schools.

3. In 1965 a good Howard College became a great university under the name of Samford.

4. Graduate programs were reinstituted in 1965.

5. In 1966 three divisions were elevated to school status and became the schools of Business, Education, and Pharmacy.

6. A dean was appointed for the Howard College of Arts and Sciences and the division of graduate studies was given school status in 1968.

7. In 1969 the University adopted the 4–1–4 calendar, and the division of music became a school.

8. Samford University established an Air Force ROTC unit in 1972.

9. In 1973 Samford University joined with the Birmingham Baptist Medical Centers to offer both two-year and four-year degrees in nursing.

10. In 1975 an Adult Education division was created.

11. In 1977 the division of Paralegal Studies became a reality.

12. In cooperation with the Baptist Medical Centers, in 1977 the University established the Division of Anesthesia.

13. In 1981 Samford inaugurated the Cooperative Education program.

14. Only twenty-one majors were offered in 1958; today students are able to enroll in more than fifty courses of study. In fact, more than half the undergraduates enrolled in the fall of 1982 were majoring in programs not available in 1970, and over sixty percent of all students were in courses not available in 1958.

Under Dr. Wright's leadership the University's unswerving commitment to honor God in all of its programs has been underscored this year, 1983, by Samford's leading the nation's colleges and universities in the number of missionary kids enrolled, the number of alumni appointed by the Foreign Mission Board, and the number of Samford graduates approved as Missionary Journeymen. At the two Southern Baptist seminaries closest to Birmingham, Samford has more graduates enrolled in training for full time Christian service than any other college or university.

It has been my personal good fortune that my thirty years with Howard College and Samford University have coincided with the twenty-five years of Dr. Wright's presidency. Perhaps you will allow me in the remaining moments to reminisce concerning the view of this man in a twenty-five year working relationship, or what I've seen from where I've sat.

My first view of Dr. Wright came from where I sat in a mathematics professor's chair as a young teacher, eager to experiment with new methods of teaching the ancient science of mathematics. It was most gratifying to experience the genuine interest and support for my area of concentration. (I have always suspected that this was partially due to the fact that Mrs. Wright had been a mathematics teacher.) This interest, however, was typical of his concern for the individual faculty member in all areas of study. There has been constant encouragement for innovative ideas that would benefit the overall purpose of this institution.

Some years later what I saw from where I sat in the chair of dean of Arts and Sciences served only to reaffirm the high qualities of this man's character, a man never satisfied with the status quo, but constantly researching new ideas and providing the impetus to bring them into reality.

For some thirteen years now my view has been from the chair of the Vice President for Academic Affairs, and what I've seen from where I've sat, Dr. Wright has been a man of tireless energy who, from early morning breakfast meetings to late evening appointments, has dealt patiently with the endless array of student, faculty, and administrative problems that have required a Solomon-like wisdom.

Yes, from what I've seen from where I've sat, Samford University is a great institution today because of the greatness of Leslie S. Wright.

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) Post-Herald, Sept. 2, 1983]

WRIGHT RETIRES AFTER LEADING SAMFORD IN GROWTH YEARS

(By Emmett Weaver)

On Sept. 1, 1958, a relatively unknown 45-year-old Baptist leader from Montgomery took over as the new president of Howard College.

At that time the school, which later became Samford University, had only seven buildings and the student enrollment was 1,800.

Also the privately supported college had only recently moved from its old East Lake campus to its present location over the mountain. There were still some postwar students attending classes under the GI Bill of Rights.

"I Think they have chosen an excellent man," Harwell G. Davis, the retiring president was quoted then in a Birmingham Post-Herald article. "I think the college will continue to grow and progress under his leadership."

But even Davis' predictions about the school's future couldn't have anticipated what the next quarter century would bring under Leslie Wright's leadership.

Neither did the ambitious former assistant to then-U.S. Sen. Lister Hill envision the amazing growth at the south Lakeshore Drive campus.

Since Wright became president, 27 buildings have been built and enrollment has reached 4,100.

Wright, who stepped down earlier this week as president, assuming the honorary title of chancellor, looked back over those years and said it would be impossible to build the university today as it was built during the past 25 years. "We couldn't do it today because of inflation and today's building costs."

Wright estimated that the total replacement value of the Samford physical plant would be $100 million.

He said the school had invested half that amount in the building program to date.

Wright, who will celebrate his 71st birthday in January, said after his final day earlier this week that he felt "relaxed, at the same time happy and proud of what has been accomplished" the past 25 years at Samford.

Executive president of the Baptist Foundation of Alabama before becoming university president, Wright called the building of physical plant that is Samford his biggest accomplishment.

So when Thomas E. Corts of Wingate College in North Carolina took over as president earlier this week, he assumed the top administrative position of the third largest Baptist university in the country.

Only Baylor University in Waco, Tex., which is No. 1 with its 10,000-student enrollment, and the University of Richmond in Virginia with 4,500 students, surpass the Birmingham school.

Corts completed his first day on the job yesterday as new president, and said he hopes to bring a broader international scope to Samford with a wider variety of cultural programs.

The new president has been holding retreats to acquaint himself with the faculty this week. He took one group of faculty members to the Baptist camp at Shocco Springs last weekend.

According to Wright, the Samford building program is 95 percent complete although the school still owns 250 acres adjacent to the campus which could be developed for non-academic, commerical purposes.

Only two student dormitories and a continuing education center are still on the drawing board.

Instead of a faculty of only 60 back in 1958, today's staff has grown to 225 in addition to a part-time faculty of 70.

The Lakeshore campus has mushroomed with its Georgian Colonial buildings dotting the mountainside.

Reviewing the major building program which has been a milestone during the Wright years, the ex-president said it was fortunate the same architect stayed on during the entire program.

"In feel we have one of the most beautiful campuses anywhere in the world. Sure, there are older campuses in Europe and U.S., with ivy on the walls, but they aren't any more beautiful than ours."

Another educational coup of the past quarter-century has been the moving of Cumberland Law School in 1961 from Lebanon, Tenn. to Birmingham.

For the first year, the class numbered only 60. Today the law school has an enrollment of 700.

Another sign of progress has been the establishment of a School of Nursing which works closely with the two Baptist Medical centers in the Birmingham area.

Wright points with pride to the university's School of Business, which has 647 students this year.

He also is proud of the fact that Samford prepares 600 students every year for Christian service.

But he forsees problems and challenges for the new president of Samford.

Two tasks confronting Samford in the future, according to the retired president, are attracting new students and finding enough money to operate.

He believes that sectarian schools, because they lack a tax base or a rich endowment, must depend more on student tuition money to keep operating in the black.

Wright emphasized the importance of building up the endowment fund.

Presently the Samford endowment fund is a modest $7 million, but he said that the university ought to have at least a $50 million endowment.

Now that he will no longer have the administrative duties and responsibilities as president, with the honorary position of chancellor, Wright and his wife will be free to travel.

As director of the Rotary International, he plans to attend a worldwide convention in Birmingham, England next May. It will be his first time to visit Alabama's sister English city.

And how does Mrs. Wright feel about her husband's retirement as president?

"I'm as happy as I can be. I've been trying to get him to retire for years."

CORTS, AS NEW UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT, TO STRESS IMPORTANCE OF WORLD CITIZENSHIP

Samford University's new president Thomas E. Corts was a busy man yesterday his first day on the job.

His 17-hour day began at 7 a.m. with a breakfast for the athletic department. It ended after 10 p.m. following a reception for new freshman students in Beeson Hall.

"It was a busy, but enjoyable day getting to meet the students and the faculty," said the 41-year-old North Carolina educator.

"I'm still learning my way around here on the campus and the city."

This past weekend he treated the faculty to a get-acquainted retreat at Shocco Springs in Talladega County.

While it is still too soon for any changes at Samford, Corts said he thinks it is important to broaden the international horizons of the campus community.

And the role of world citizenship definitely will be stressed at Samford, Corts said. He came to Birmingham from Wingate College in North Carolina where he was president for nine years.

While president of Wingate, a small school located southeast of Charlotte, Corts initiated an international travel program.

Corts believes people from small communities especially need to see what it means to be a world citizen.

Travel outside one's own country enrichens the person, said the new president.

"The ultimate lesson that students can learn in foreign travel is to appreciate their own country more, so that when they come home again they feel like kissing the soil."

Corts's wife, Marla, is a nurse who worked in a hospital emergency room work while he was president of Wingate.

He has three children. They are Jennifer, 17, who will be a freshman at Samford this year, Rachel, 15, and Christian, 11.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary of the Senate proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will stand in recess until 2 p.m. today.

Thereupon, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mrs. HAWKINS).

AUTHORIZATION FOR FURTHER U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, will the Chair please state the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) to authorize the further participation of U.S. Armed Forces in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159), which was reported on yesterday, September 26, 1983, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon Resolution".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

Sec. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the removal of all foreign forces from Lebanon is an essential United States foreign policy objective in the Middle East;

(2) in order to restore full control by the Government of Lebanon over its own territory, the United States is currently participating in the multinational peacekeeping force (hereafter in this resolution referred to as the "Multinational Force in Lebanon") which was established in accordance with the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982;

(3) the Multinational Force in Lebanon better enables the Government of Lebanon to establish its unity, independence, and territorial integrity;

(4) progress toward national political reconciliation in Lebanon is necessary; and

(5) United States Armed Forces participating in the Multinational Force in Lebanon are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the War Powers Resolution.

(b) The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983. Consistent with section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, the purpose of this joint resolution is to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

(c) The Congress intends this joint resolution to constitute the necessary specific statutory authorization under the War Powers Resolution for continued participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONTINUED PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. As required by section 4(c) of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall report periodically to the Congress with respect to the situation in Lebanon, but in no event shall he report less often than once every three months. In addition to providing the information required by that section on the status, scope, and duration of hostilities involving United States Armed Forces, such reports shall describe in detail—

(1) the activities being performed by the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(2) the present composition of the Multinational Force in Lebanon, including a description of the responsibilities and deployment of the armed forces of each participating country;

(3) the results of efforts to reduce and eventually eliminate the Multinational Force in Lebanon;

(4) how continued United States participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is advancing United States foreign policy interests in the Middle East; and

(5) what progress has occurred toward national political reconciliation among all Lebanese groups.

STATEMENTS OF POLICY

SEC. 5. (a) The Congress declares that the participation of the armed forces of other countries in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is essential to maintain the international character of the peacekeeping function in Lebanon.

(b) The Congress believes that it should continue to be the policy of the United States to promote continuing discussions with Israel, Syria, and Lebanon with the objective of bringing about the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon and establishing an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area.

(c) It is the sense of the Congress that, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution and at least once a year thereafter, the United States should discuss with the other members of the security council of the United Nations the establishment of a United Nations peacekeeping force to assume the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon. An analysis of the implications of the response to such discussions for the continuation of the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be included in the reports required under paragraph (3) of section 4 of this resolution.

DURATION OF AUTHORIZATION FOR UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE MULTINATIONAL FORCE IN LEBANON

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

(b) Nothing in this joint resolution modifies, limits, or supersedes any provision of the War Powers Resolution or the requirement of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, relating to congressional authorization for any substantial expansion in the number or role of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon.

CONGRESSIONAL PRIORITY PROCEDURES FOR AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) Any joint resolution or bill introduced to amend or repeal this Act shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives or the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as the case may be. Such joint resolution or bill shall be considered by such committee within fifteen calendar days and may be reported out, together with its recommendations, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(b) Any joint resolution or bill so reported shall become the pending business of the House in question (in the case of the Senate the time for debate shall be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents) and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(c) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall be referred to the committee of the other House named in subsection (1) and shall be reported out by such committee together with its recommendations within fifteen calendar days and shall thereupon become the pending business of such House and shall be voted upon within three calendar days, unless such House shall otherwise determine by the yeas and nays.

(d) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such joint resolution within six calendar days after the legislation is referred to the committee of conference. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the Record or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than six calendar days after the conference report is filed. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within forty-eight hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I am told that the Senator from Mississippi is prepared to speak on this subject.

Mr. STENNIS. That is what I am going to speak on.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I yield the floor.

Mr. STENNIS. Madam President, I understand that the Senator from Mississippi has been allotted 30 minutes of time on this subject matter; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no order to that effect.

Mr. STENNIS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allotted 30 minutes of time to speak on this subject matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STENNIS. Madam President, and Members of the Senate, I do not know of a more vital nor a more important subject that we could have appearing on our list of major items, that our Nation could have on its list of major items, than the situation we have now with reference to the possibility of war following the presence of our military forces in other countries, even though we are there by invitation.

I thought about this a great deal over a period of years, Madam President, and I do not like to talk about myself, but I have decided that maybe my experiences here on a similar subject matter might be of some value, and in that connection I want to comment on one part of the steps forward in moving into the war we got into in South Vietnam in 1954. I made a speech here in the Chamber on this general subject matter and particularly with reference to the possibilities of getting into war there. I looked at the RECORD today to see how many of our present Members were here on that day of 1954. By quick glance, if I am correct, there are only two here now who were here then, and I am one of the two. The other man is in town, but I did not try to bring him in.

But it did underscore how fast time moves on and problems in a way remain similar or the same.

Madam President, I was here in 1950 when we were debating then on a resolution passed unanimously by the seven members of the Security Council of the recently formed United Nations to which we belonged and relying on that we formally entered the Korean war and sent troops to take up battle positions in the actual fighting there in Korea.

There was no expressed authorization or formal consideration of the question of entering the war by the Senate or by the House of Representatives.

The general understanding was that we were committed by the affirmative vote, which included our own, of all members present and voting in the Security Council of the United Nations.

I remember I was standing just to the rear here of where I am now when the word came in, an AP report that President Truman had actually moved forward and had sent troops, a certain number of troops, who were already on their way to Korea and would be landing there within a few hours to take their position in the fighting in support of a battle that was already going on.

Of course, that action was taken in the same general atmosphere that I will refer to later but we were committed by the United Nations vote.

I remember the sensations I had, the realization that I had that is the first time we have ever deliberately entered an actual war without a declaration of war being declared by Members of Congress, who are the real special representatives and only representatives under our form of government of the people when it comes to this power of declaring war.

I was also here as a Member in the beginning of our participation in the war in Vietnam in 1954. In a Senate floor speech I warned against sending in our fresh, uniformed military men to Vietnam and publicly asked then-President Eisenhower that they be withdrawn. They were withdrawn. There were 200 Air Force mechanics. But others were sent in some time soon thereafter.

My objection was that there had been no declaration of war by Congress and the participation therein was not authorized, and before this matter was over about the war in Vietnam, our four Presidents had become involved, Mr. Eisenhower, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Nixon, and participation continued for several years. At the peak of the Vietnam conflict, by April 30, 1969, 543,000 Armed Forces personnel were involved in Vietnam. For the duration of the conflict there were 47,269 U.S. military service people killed. In addition, there were over 10,000 noncombat deaths. And our total wounded, not mortally wounded, but wounded, was 303,635.

Madam President, there was never a declaration of war in that instance by Congress, even though there was a so-called Gulf of Tonkin resolution which was passed and was claimed by some to be a substitute war declaration.

It is true that year after year Congress appropriated money for our troops and war materiels in Vietnam, but this falls far short of the constitutional declaration of war.

I do not relate these matters critically. I was involved. I was in them. I was a part of it. Whatever deficiencies I refer to here in Congress I am including myself.

During all of our war in Vietnam I was on both the Armed Services Committee and the Appropriations Committee. I held hearings and handled on the floor many of the key bills that included manpower, money, and supplies, but no hearings were ever held on a war resolution that called on Congress to vote yes or no and give the people of the country a chance to express themselves through their chosen Representatives in Congress.

I relate these facts just as a part of an eyewitness and a part of them and not in criticism of anyone. We received a great number of periodic rosy reports about the war in Vietnam from various sources.

Many of these we later found to be based on erroneous data. A conspicuous example was the Tet offensive which came along very shortly after an optimistic report and literally blew out the light at the end of the tunnel that we had been told about.

On a day-to-day basis, I was working steadily with a number of the experienced, seasoned, and wise members of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Appropriations Committee. All would ask the question to each other over and over again: "How did we get into this war?" It was just unbelievable—the conditions in Vietnam, the limited fighting strength of the navies, the lack of resources, their lack of understanding of war conditions. Our people at home did not understand the facts and felt that they were taken in blind.

I do not mention these facts to discredit the Vietnamese. I am talking about conditions there we were faced with and for which our men died.

But I fully made up my mind many times over during all this Vietnam experience that when the fighting was over I would seek a way to implement and make known the importance and wisdom of that constitutional provision that provides the Congress shall have the power to declare war.

Now, that means, Madam President, it is not a matter of whose power it is; it is not a matter of some award being given by the Constitution to the legislative branch. This means that the Congress has the responsibility and the duty to develop all the facts available and then declare war if that course seems necessary.

Let me emphasize, even before the fighting in Vietnam stopped, I set out, along with others, to do what I could to make that provision of the Constitution better understood, and better used, and above all else, to see that Congress in the future would develop all the facts relating to the question of involving our Nation in hostilities, including the declaration of war when justified by the facts.

The Congress was given that sole constitutional power. In world affairs, we must have a working plan between the President and the Congress as to how the Armed Forces of the United States may be used in foreign countries or foreign areas of the world. Both should be involved in such matters and carry responsibilities therefor, with the Congress retaining the sole power to actually declare war.

Madam President, let me turn to the Constitution and the spirit thereof and my recollection of the actual putting together of that amazing document. There was a great deal of doubt—honest doubt—among the people whether or not the large Government that ours was destined to be could operate itself. There was firm belief by some that a royal family was necessary to assure a continuing group of successors automatic to that power, rather than a hiatus and uncertainty due to death or due to elections. There was a great belief that there was a chance that some who might be elected President would turn out to be tyrants and overrun their authority and willfully put the people to war. So authority was very carefully withheld from all that group that I referred to and got down to one group left—the Congress. And to them the Congress largely meant the House of Representatives, because it had already been agreed that they would be selected on the basis of population and everyone to some degree would be represented, every area of the Nation, and that would grow as the country grew later. They finally perfected and agreed upon how the Senate would be constituted and it went on the basis of States, two to each State, as we know.

But the real reasoning in there—and I go back now to some research that I have done partly while a student studying constitutional law—something I never got to practice but I have worked in and around it some—it got right down to the bottom line that they wanted to put the responsibility on someone that was directly responsible to the people. And they would have to look the people in the face, many of them knowing the House Members personally. So they put all the responsibility directly on the Congress; there has never been any argument about it since. There has been some ignoring, though, of those terms.

We found, during the war in Vietnam, we could not find an instrument to get a hold on to launch an understanding campaign before the people that only the Congress had the power to declare war and the issue ought to be brought to a head. That instrument was 200 years old, had lain there all that time. It had been obeyed, but it was not a household term and understanding with their people. We felt a need to rewrite the principle in some way that would be a more modern approach and give a handle to the problem that we could get the people interested in and help them to fully understand.

And because of that need, there grew up the initial efforts to draw a proposed statute to meet the situation that finally became known as the War Powers Act.

Now I am not claiming any great credit for that. I was one of the instigators for the reasons I have given, but circumstances took me out away from the floor of the Senate for 5 months then in a personal round I had. I did not really get to take part in the hearings and I do not think I was here at the final passage before the Senate.

But I was here when the conference report came in and I was here when the veto message came in on the bill that we had passed. And I was here and the motion was made to pass the bill, the President's veto notwithstanding. The House had already overwhelmingly passed what we now call the War Powers Act by a vote of more than 4 to 1. A motion to override the veto came on here in the Senate and we passed it I think by about 3 to 1. It was an overwhelming demonstration of the interests of the people who had been aroused. And they fully understood how they were involved directly and they did not want any more of the Vietnam experiences.

And now for the first time we find this newly passed law—all did not quite agree with it then, and I am certainly not trying to be critical of our present President of the United States—but we find now that it first looked like the law was going to be cold shouldered and put out of the way or not used or ignored. That has now changed and we are on the verge here of just passing a resolution, if it was changed some, and say, "Well, we are going to enforce the law as it is. We are going to follow the law as it is." That is not enough.

We should not pass the proposal here without examining and looking further into this thing and seeing what the basis is of being in Lebanon and these other places, what is the plan and what are the prospects and what it will mean to the people—what it will mean to the people—if we go on into this use of force further and further and further.

Without luck—I will put it this way—we can quickly get into a spot just like we were in Vietnam mighty easy. I know the day-by-day advances, and I had the feel of them. And I referred already here to the wisest and best men that we had in the Senate who would exclaim when they met day after day—I know it because I heard it—they would say, "How in the world did we let ourselves get involved in this war?"

So going back now to this matter. Of course I hope the cease-fire leads to a peace agreement and everything is rosy. It may or it may not. But regardless of that, the outcome, the real point involved and the real concern and meaning to our people is that, by and large, they are the ones that are going to have to put up the boys and the blood and the members of their family to fight a war if we get into it now or later. Let us just look it right in the face and tell them the truth.

Now I respect every Member here and his desire to find the best way to go, the best way out, whatever you want to call it. But we are up against that and we ought to put aside whatever time it takes to properly settle this question.

I am not surprised that the war powers resolution is challenged. It is kind of popular to complain about the power not being left in the White House or some central head like that. And it is a problem for any President—any President, makes no difference who he is, what party or anything else, or what other troubles he has.

But in this present day world—more bountiful life than we have ever dreamed about to a larger and larger percentage of our people, yet still the most troublesome and the most dangerous in many ways, nuclear weapons included or excluded—something has got to be done in this field. Some power has got to be had. Some power has got to be exercised. Some better understanding, must be had by the people—now they are not ignorant, not at all. But they are not sufficiently informed as to the meaning of these matters and where these proper principles of our system of Government come in. And I think it is highly proper that the Constitution continue to put this power to commit this Nation to war in the Congress. It is put exactly in the right place, and we must continue to keep it in that place.

Regardless of what comes, I think, about world agreements, I think for a long, long time to come we are going to have to retain the power to say when we shall be committed to war.

Now that was not true in Vietnam. One reason I ran for the Senate was to try to make some contribution toward the way that the United Nations was pointing then. And we tried that and everybody, other countries, gave it a fair trial. We went, as I see it, too fast and expected too much; we ran by a lot of bad signals. It had not been able to function with effectiveness in enough fields of activity to dispense with the necessity of a country, especially as large as ours is, farflung as it is, and with conditions now where we have to have trade routes all over the world to maintain our economy and a great many other reasons why we must be able to carry on even with force if necessary and particularly a defensive force.

So, I think it will be a long time before it will be safe to take this power, modified in any large way, from where it is now, the constitutional power, resting solely in the Congress, to commit our country to a war, be it on the defense or offense. Of course, we always think that we go to war because of defense.

Madam President, I am not apologizing for anything I said, but on this matter some of the argument goes that this is a limit on the President and all of that. Well, my political philosophy, and it is reflected in my voting record, is that I think, under our system of government, we have to have some administration that can function, whether it is in my party or not; you have to have backing enough for the President on the floor of the Congress, the House and the Senate, to give him a reasonable amount of support to meet his problems and try to solve them. So I am not given to a pattern of moving in to try to embarrass the present President or any of the rest. I have had the privilege of dealing with four of them, at least, on this question of war powers and having gotten into a war where we could not get out—that is Mr. Eisenhower, Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Nixon. I know how it goes to the interest of the country.

I cannot vote for this resolution in its present form. I tried to do it. I tried to rise to the occasion for the necessity of the country, but I could not go for it. I cannot rest until we do something that is a step forward in perfecting a plan—we can do it within this law—that will have the support of the President and the legislative branch, be they from the same party or not or having mixed parties represented. It is an absolute must and it is a must that must be met because it goes to the vital interest, the safety and security of our people that have no other way of protecting themselves except to rely on the Constitution of the United States and those that they select. They select most of them to carry out its principles.

Madam President, I am not much on offering amendments. I think we ought to vote this resolution down, however good its intentions, while we are clear of any kind of personal blame or trying to put the onus on someone else, and make a new start and reach some kind of plan that will lead to fulfillment. We are going to have trouble all over the world—I think we already have it. I would believe certainly that we could work out a plan—I have seen temporary plans worked out here by just getting, by unofficial selection, say six Members of the House and six Members of the Senate, selected from the two parties and representing positions of leadership, to have a conference and work out matters and solve things on a temporary basis anyway, without always fully disclosing all of the plan.

That is how that works here. I remember one time particularly where we got tied up here on an important matter. This was with regard to intelligence. We got the late Senator Taft of Ohio and the then Senator from Alabama (Mr. Sparkman), and they went off alone 2 days and had such records brought as they wanted and came back in here and said, "Everything is satisfactory." Every Member of this body took that representation fully, for its full worth, and we moved onto our business.

I think, in an informal way, we could get something worked out here that would meet this situation. We have tried hard enough. But more then ever we have a law now that is in effect, this War Powers Act. The thing to do is change it, not abandon it, not deny it, not dispute it, not try to repudiate it, but amend it. I personally know something about when we are left without some kind of an instrument that Congress can have in its hand to carry out this high responsibility with reference to war and declaring war.

Let me mention an incidental matter about the Constitution, too. They finally got it settled about who was going to have the power to declare war, and that led to an argument that went on very severely about who was going to be Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces. They just turned immediately and said, the President of the United States will be the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces and signed their names to it and went on.

Those things go together. It is hard for a President to conform, it is hard for the Congress to conform, but anyway, it is clear that the only ones who have power to do it is those who hold those offices, the incumbents. So I think it is up to us to do it.

I do not know if my time is up. I shall yield to the Senator from Arkansas if he has a question for me.

Madam President, I thank the Senator. My time is up. Is that correct?

Mr. PELL. There is no controlled time.

Mr. STENNIS. Well, others are here. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has no limitation on the amount of time he may speak.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Chair very much. I yield the floor anyway, Madam President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Madam President, I have sat for the last few moments listening to the distinguished senior Senator from the State of Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS). I grew up, I say to my colleagues and the Chair, in the southern part of Arkansas, bordering the northern part of the State of Mississippi. I grew up there as a young man hearing about, studying about, reading about a man named JOHN STENNIS, the Senator from Mississippi. I have always had the greatest admiration for Senator STENNIS, the senior Senator from Mississippi. Madam President, at no time have I ever had a greater admiration or a deeper respect or higher esteem for this great man, this great statesman, then I have this afternoon, after listening to him discuss the complexities and the crisis that we are involved in today with regard to the War Powers Act.

Mr. STENNIS. If the Senator will yield, I thank him very much. He is a very fine gentleman, who has always been very gracious to me.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

Madam President, the Senator from Mississippi has brought up before the Chamber and before our colleagues the matter of the Constitution of the United States and a great deal of history that went into the Constitution and the framing of the Constitution. I should like to read the oath of office that the President of the United States must take before entering the Presidency. That is article II, section 1. I quote:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.

That is the oath of office of the President, which we require him to recite upon entering that most sacred, solemn, and important office.

Madam President, my question today is simply this: Since the President himself—or as his advisers have advised him, whichever the case may be—has totally ignored the law that was passed by this Congress as empowered by the Constitution, which is known as the War Powers Act, suppose we pass another resolution allowing the President to keep our troops in Lebanon under the War Powers Act for 18 months or 1 year or 6 months or whatever. Then is the President going to see that particular statute, that particular resolution or act of the Congress and say, "Well, I don't like that one very much. I think that I will decide not to obey that law also"?

Have we reached the point in this country—and we say that we are a country of laws and not of men—have we reached the point where the President can pick and choose, just like at a smorgasbord or cafeteria, and say, "I like this, I am going to obey that, or that looks at right, I will go along with it. Well, that law I don't like, so I am not going to obey it"? Is that where we are in our Republic after 200 years?

That is my fear, Madam President. Not only are we trying to decide what to do about Lebanon, for that is only one issue. The other issue is, what are we going to do about an administration that obeys only those laws that it wants to obey and throws the rest aside?

I think that is a very serious concern that we have at this moment in the Senate.

I remember years ago in a political science class the professor told us that what we need is a fourth branch of government to enforce against the other three branches of the Government the laws that need to be enforced under the system of checks and balances, and right now we may want to think about that. If we say, "OK, the War Powers Act as passed in 1973 is the law of this land, and, Mr. President, it is now running and we are counting the days," what is going to make the President comply with that law? I do not know of a remedy. Maybe there is one that a constitutional scholar could give us, but, in any event, this matter goes deeper than Lebanon. That issue is simply what brought it to the surface.

Madam President, I am gravely concerned about the relationship today between the President and the Congress and the system of checks and balances that I find in grave jeopardy because of the President's failure to recognize and enforce and implement the War Powers Act as passed in 1973.

I yield the floor, Madam President.

Mr. PELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PERCY. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on the desk of every Senator is a letter that I have received from the President, and I would draw my colleagues' attention to that letter. It pertains to the cease-fire in Lebanon. It pertains to the relationship of that cease-fire to the resolution that is before the Senate now involving war powers, and I will read that letter at this time.

DEAR CHUCK: I know you were as gratified as I with Sunday's announcement of a cease fire in Lebanon. While there were many things that contributed to the cease fire, it is my belief that your agreement to advance the compromise resolution on war powers—and the favorable action by the Foreign Affairs and Foreign Relations Committees—were particularly important. At a crucial point, your agreement and the supporting committee actions expressed a commitment to bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy. Please accept my thanks.

Let me also take this opportunity to clarify an issue with respect to the interpretation of the compromise resolution. The compromise resolution refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act; I gather that a question has arisen as to the Executive Branch's understanding and intention in this regard. My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

In addition, regarding the Administration's intentions with respect to the 18-month time period, I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Again let me thank you for your support for the compromise agreement. I believe its prompt enactment will only further improve the chances for the stable peace we seek in Lebanon.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

This letter is dated September 27, 1983, and constitutes in my judgment a very welcome birthday present from the President of the United States.

Mr. FORD. Will the distinguished floor manager of the bill answer a question or two?

Mr. PERCY. Yes, of course.

Mr. FORD. How does the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act apply to the War Powers Act?

Mr. PERCY. The Lebanon Assistance Act is an act which provides for economic and military assistance to Lebanon. Many other countries including countries from the Arab world also have provided assistance to Lebanon.

We also provide for a peacekeeping force. The Lebanon Assistance Act places limitations upon the number and role of our forces in Lebanon.

The War Powers Act limits the time when American military forces can be in an area when imminent hostilities are present unless congressional authorization is provided. That timeframe is 60 days from the date it is determined that imminent hostilities are present. There can be under certain circumstances an extension of 30 days on the President's own authority and certification. After that, authorization is needed.

The relationship to the resolution before us is that we indicate clearly the presence of those forces is now in accordance with and subject to the conditions and terms of the War Powers Act. The President has said he will sign the joint resolution before us.

This letter from the President clearly indicates that not only does he understand the compromise resolution that has been worked out refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, but also attempts to clarify and does clarify the executive branch understanding and intention in regard to its implementation. He indicates that when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, and he now reiterates and reaffirms:

It would be my intention to seek congressional authorization—as contemplated by the act—if circumstances require any substantial expansions in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

Mr. FORD. May I ask the chairman, does it anywhere in this letter say that the President of the United States will comply with the War Powers Act as setting out the mission of our troops in Lebanon, how long they will stay there, all these things that would trigger the War Powers Act? All I read into this is it is the Lebanon Act that he will comply with. And if we take Secretary Shultz' statement—and I have not heard anything yet today that would change that—he, in so many words, said that the President nor the administration would comply with the War Powers Act or any other act.

Mr. PERCY. Except for the fact that the President has said that he will sign the resolution that is before us, and the resolution that is before us specifically has reference to the War Powers Act.

Mr. FORD. Does this resolution require the President to submit to Congress the mission of our troops in Lebanon?

Mr. PERCY. It is my understanding that it does.

Mr. FORD. How long will the President have to submit that statement to Congress on the mission of our military personnel in Lebanon?

Mr. PERCY. Very shortly after the troops were committed to Lebanon as a peacekeeping force, the administration outlined the mission of those troops, the long-range goal of those troops.

Secretary Shultz, in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, reiterated that those goals, objectives, and the mission of our Forces have not changed or been altered in the interim year. We have not achieved our end objective, but still the objective and goal remains the same.

Mr. FORD. If I understand it, the hostilities now have started, and that triggered the War Powers Act, and that is far different from the mission of our troops 1 year ago.

Now we are not only firing to defend our troops, but also, we are firing to support government troops. We are firing on the Druze.

All these things are happening, and the Senator from Illinois tells me that the mission today is the same as it was 1 year ago.

Then, the Senator from Illinois also says that the President will shortly send to Congress the mission of the troops. I do not see that in any resolution. I do not see that in the letter which the Senator from Illinois just quoted. I do not see anywhere in here that he says he will tell the American people, through the Congress of the United States, what the mission of our troops is in Lebanon.

Can the Senator answer that?

Mr. PERCY. I can merely answer it by indicating that the Secretary of State, on behalf of the President, has outlined as clearly as he could in his testimony, his written testimony, and his extemporaneous answers to a series of questions put to him by members of the committee, exactly what the mission of those forces is.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. I have one question, and then I will yield to the Senator from Maryland.

I ask the Senator from Illinois this question: How long does the President have to send to Congress, if we pass the resolution that is now before the Senate, to outline the mission, the timeframe, and the total number of troops as triggered under the War Powers Act, as the Senator from Illinois just said he would have to do?

Mr. PERCY. With respect to the mission, he has already stated what the mission is.

Mr. FORD. The War Powers Act has not been triggered. It was triggered on August 29, and on August 29 our mission there took a 180-degree turn.

Mr. PERCY. This date of August 29 was triggered by Congress. We unilaterally decided that was the date, and the President has not disagreed.

Mr. FORD. When Americans start spilling their blood on Lebanese soil, I think it is about time we declare something.

Mr. PERCY. I can read to the Senator from Kentucky the letter from Ambassador Dillon to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs of Lebanon, dated September 25, 1982. He said:

BEIRUT, September 25, 1982.

His Excellency FOUAD BUTRUS,
Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Beirut.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to refer to Your Excellency's note of 25 September 1982 requesting the deployment of an American Force to the Beirut area. I am pleased to inform you on behalf of my Government that the United States is prepared to deploy temporarily a force of approximately 1200 personnel as part of a Multinational Force (MNF) to establish an environment which will permit the Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) to carry out their responsibilities in the Beirut area. It is understood that the presence of such an American Force will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority over the Beirut area, an objective which is fully shared by my Government, and thereby further efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred.

I have the further honor to inform Your Excellency that my Government accepts the terms and conditions concerning the presence of the American Force in the Beirut area as set forth in your note, and that Your Excellency's note and this reply accordingly constitute an agreement between our two Governments.

ROBERT DILLION,
Ambassador of the United States.

Mr. FORD. What is the Beirut area—sovereignty over the Beirut area? I thought it was a total country. I thought it was the country of Lebanon.

Mr. PERCY. I interpret the Beirut area as an area not strictly limited to the city limits of Beirut but certainly not as extensive as the entire country of Lebanon.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, I think the Senator from Kentucky has put his finger on two very important points.

The first is the definition of the mission which is being expanded with each passing day. The Senator from Illinois has just quoted an exchange of notes of a year ago, September 25, 1982. But the resolution before us, by its own terms in the title, says that this resolution is to deal with removing foreign forces from Lebanon, and the findings are to the same point in section 2.

Furthermore, the Secretary stated over the weekend as follows, and I am now quoting from an article:

Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawal of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior adminstration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows if the Syrians will ever agree to pull out."

Later on in the same interview, the Secretary of State said the following—and the Senator from Kentucky is right on point to be pursuing this line of questioning:

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational forces being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 25, 1983]

SHULTZ TIES WITHDRAWAL TO LEBANON'S STABILITY

WASHINGTON.—Secretary of State George P. Shultz said yesterday that the mission of the U.S. marines and other Western forces should continue in Lebanon until there is stability in that country, which he indicated should include the withdrawl of Israeli, Syrian and Palestine Liberation Organization forces.

Given the chaotic situation in Lebanon, a senior administration official acknowledged, this could mean an indefinite commitment to remain there because "nobody knows, if the Syrians will ever agree to pull out."

Mr. Shultz's comments, which came in an interview over the Cable News Network, were likely to cause further concern in Congress because, as he did when he testified last Wednesday before two congressional committees, the secretary refused to guarantee that the marines now in Lebanon would be pulled out in 18 months or that the size of the contingent or the scope of its mission would be expanded.

A resolution pending before Congress that President Reagan has agreed to sign is meant by its congressional sponsors to put definite limits on the role of the marines under the authority of the 1973 War Powers Act.

When asked if he would guarantee that the size of the force would not be enlarged, Mr. Shultz said yesterday that although there was no plan for an increase, he would not provide a "guarantee, which is a flat, unequivocal, never-say-never type of thing."

He said in defending his refusal to give a pledge of no change that "you can't foresee what the situation may be."

"And I don't want to be in the position of acting as though I know exactly what the situation will be," he said.

At one point in the interview, the secretary refused to provide details on the conditions for pulling out the approximately 5,500 American, British, French, and Italian members of the multinational force. But under questioning, he added:

"We have to judge the situation, and we want to have the marines continue their mission, and the other multinational force elements continue their mission, in supporting the emergence of stability in Lebanon. If we can find a situation in Lebanon that has stability in it, in terms of the structure of the government and removal of foreign forces, that's the objective."

When asked if that meant it would not be possible to achieve "stability" without the removal of the foreign forces, he agreed, saying: "I think that if you have a country with, say, 75 percent or so occupied by foreign forces, it's hard to see how the government of that country has control of it, and has stability."

Mr. Shultz also said that even if the foreign forces are withdrawn eventually, he could foresee the multinational forces being given another mission. Instead of being stationed in the Beirut area, "we've always had it in mind that if withdrawal of all foreign forces could be brought about and the Lebanese armed forces, which we've been helping train, can move in and take charge in those areas, that the multinational force, not just our marines, might occupy some strategic positions in Lebanon."

A senior official said that there has been planning for the Western forces to be stationed in such key areas as the Beirut-Damascus highway to ensure that Syrian or PLO forces do not reenter Lebanon. They also might be sent to port areas and other regions to serve as a political support to the Lebanese.

U.S. officials said yesterday they were not certain how many foreign troops are in Lebanon. But one official estimated there are about 15,000 Israelis in southern Lebanon, about 40,000 Syrians in eastern and northern Lebanon and 11,000 to 15,000 Palestinian forces, some of them attached to the Syrian army and others on their own. There also are small numbers of Iranians and Libyans in support of the anti-government forces in Lebanon.

Senator Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R, Md.), when told of Mr. Shultz's comments yesterday, said that he felt the administration was being "ungenerous" and "unresponsive," given the desire of Congress to be cooperative. But he said that although the administration does not want "to waive any of its rights," he believed that once the resolution limiting the time, scope and size of the U.S. involvement in Lebanon was passed and signed, the administration probably would be "willing to live with it."

Mr. SARBANES. Madam President, the other point that the Senator from Kentucky was addressing is equally important, and the Senator was very perceptive in examining the letter that has come from President Reagan, which the chairman of the committee has been quoting. As he noted, the letter talks about not complying with the terms of the resolution before us but talks about the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act and says: "My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act."

I repeat that: "My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act."

I should like to read to the Senate—because it is not attached as an addendum to the President's letter—what the President said when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, if his intentions and understanding remain exactly as they were when he signed it. This is the statement of President Reagan on signing S. 639 into law on June 27, 1983:

I am pleased to sign into law S. 639, the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983. This act authorizes the appropriation of urgently needed economic and military assistance for Lebanon. The funding authorized by this act will greatly assist in promoting the economic and political stability of that country and support the international effort to strengthen a sovereign and independent Lebanon.

Section 4(a) of the act confirms this administration's announced intention with respect to congressional authorization concerning any future substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon. As indicated in its legislative history, that section does not prevent the initiation of such actions, if circumstances require it, while Congress is considering a request for statutory authorization; nor, of course, is it intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief, particularly with respect to contingencies not expected in the context of the multinational effort to strengthen the sovereignty and independence of Lebanon.

And listen very carefully—

So at the very time that the President signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, he reserved unto himself the constitutional authorities of the President as Commander in Chief and stated that the act was not intended to infringe upon those authorities.

That is exactly the same assertion that the Secretary of State made under questioning before the committee with respect to the terms of the resolution that is before us, and the Senator from Kentucky absolutely cut right through the language of this letter to the essential point and that is, first of all, the President does not address really the resolution before us whether he will be bound by its terms, but in the course of saying and referring to the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act and stating that his understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, these are words of art and what they are intended to refer to is this statement made by the President on June 27, 1983, when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act and in my judgment in particular are meant to reserve out the provisions, "nor, of course, is intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief," the very assertion that administration spokesmen have made with respect to the terms of this resolution. They reserved that authority at the time they signed the act and the reference here to the act is not understandable unless one goes back and sees what it was the President said at the time that he signed the act.

I commend the Senator from Kentucky for his perceptive questioning of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Maryland for supporting my view and I think I have made my point, and I wish to try in my feeble way to just say how I feel and how I hope I reflect the feeling of the people I represent.

This discussion that we are having as it relates to the War Powers Act is the only way my people or the American people have of saying that, "No, we do not want our troops in Lebanon any longer than they have to be unless the President sets out a clear course and we understand that course," and we should have a course for this country before we commit the blood of our young to be lost on foreign soil.

There is a motion beginning a wave out there that this body had better pay attention to. We find we are supporting a government in El Salvador, the rebels in Nicaragua, and I read the story the other day about Honduras. Two officers who served in Vietnam said the only difference in Honduras and Vietnam is Spanish. The monkeys even wake them up chattering in the morning the same as Vietnam.

Chad, Lebanon—where are we headed? It is time that we had the great debate if that is what is necessary so that we can understand.

There is a responsibility of the President to set out our mission. That is the No. 1 priority, and the people of this country should be committed before we commit our troops.

I hope that we can find some nomenclature whereby we can extend a mite the ability to debate. What is the total military policy? Let us start out with the policy in Lebanon.

I hope, I hope, that the Lord can give us strength, the courage, and the ability to make the right decision.

I learned a long time ago in entering the political field that you have to be willing to be hated, and they are out there and I understand that and I am not afraid to be disliked as long as I can do what I think will save this country, that will bring international peace but basically we know where we are going and why.

Today we do not have that direction. No one in authority has laid it out where all could understand.

I would say to the chairman if it is his understanding that the President must send to this Senate and to this Congress the mission of American troops as passing this resolution he had better amend it so that everyone will understand it the same way he does, because when you read this letter, this letter does not substantiate the War Powers Act one iota.

You can read it in and I am not a word merchant, I am not a lawyer as many are standing around on the Senate floor, getting ready to take me on. All I come with, as a man said, armed with a silver tongue and the truth, and the truth out there is I do not believe our people want us in Lebanon unless we have a policy, a mission, and a goal and we have it spelled out for us.

We do not have that. We have a lot of things that say we are not going to pay any attention to it if it is not our will and this does not support the War Powers Act, not in my opinion.

You can find words that said, oh, you can play on them but you can also play the tune the other way after we pass it.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, who has the floor?

Mr. SARBANES. This is a very important point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICKLES). The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. PERCY. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. SARBANES. I wanted to make a unanimous-consent request to include some material in the RECORD.

Mr. PERCY. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Has the Senator included the letter from the President in the RECORD?

Mr. PERCY. Yes, that has been included in the RECORD.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, although I know it is repetitious, I think it is important to have the letter from the President of September 27, 1983, juxtaposed with the statement which the President made when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act into law because he makes reference to this in paragraph 2 of his letter and says in this letter Chairman PERCY has just received. "My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act."

Of course, when he signed that act, he made it very clear that the act was not, and I quote, "nor, of course, is it intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief."

So he was reserving his authority as Commander in Chief, and this letter which we have just received encompasses that, although in a very indirect way. One needs to go and look at the statement. So I ask unanimous consent that the President's letter and his statement of June 27, 1983, on signing the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., September 27, 1983.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHUCK: I know you were as gratified as I with Sunday's announcement of a cease fire in Lebanon. While there were many things that contributed to the cease fire, it is my belief that your agreement to advance the compromise resolution on war powers—and the favorable action by the Foreign Affairs and Foreign Relations Committees—were paticularly important. At a crucial point, your agreement and the supporting committee actions expressed a commitment to bipartisanship in U.S. foreign policy. Pleace accept my thanks.

Let me also take this opportunity to clarify an issue with respect to the interpretation of the compromise resolution. The compromise resolution refers to the requirements of section 4(a) of the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act; I gather that a question has arised as to the Executive Branch's understanding and intention in this regard. My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act: It would be my intention to seek Congressional authorization—as contemplated by the Act—if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. armed forces in Lebanon.

In addition, regarding the Administration's intentions with respect to the 18-month time period, I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms.

Again let me thank you for your support for the compromise agreement. I believe its prompt enactment will only further improve the chances for the stable peace we seek in Lebanon.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S STATEMENT IN SIGNING THE LEBANON EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE ACT

STATEMENT ON SIGNING S. 639 INTO LAW, JUNE 27, 1983

I am pleased to sign into law S. 639, the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983. This act authorizes the appropriation of urgently needed economic and military assistance for Lebanon. The funding authorized by this act will greatly assist in promoting the economic and political stability of that country and support the international effort to strengthen a sovereign and independent Lebanon.

Section 4(a) of the act confirms this administration's announced intention with respect to congressional authorization concerning any future substantial expansion in the number or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon. As indicated in its legislative history that section does not prevent the initiation of such actions, if circumstances require it while Congress is considering a request for statutory authorization; nor, of course, is it intended to infringe upon the constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief, particularly with respect to contingencies not expected in the context of the multinational effort to strengthen the sovereignty and independence of Lebanon.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I also want to note because the chairman may want to respond that on the top of the page of the President's letter with respect to the 18-month time period he does not state there that the period in the resolution before us is an authorization and that he would then have to seek a further authorization from Congress if he wishes to maintain the troops. In fact, that language is very careful. It says, "I can assure you that if our forces are needed in Lebanon beyond the 18-month period, it would be my intention to work together with the Congress with a view toward taking action on mutually acceptable terms."

If the War Powers Act applied, if he was applying the War Powers Act, what he would say is, of course, at the end of the time period stipulated in the act, whatever that might be, he would recognize that he would have to come back to Congress to obtain a further authorization.

That is not what the President has said; therefore, I think it is important that this perspective be kept in mind when viewing the letter we have just received.

Mr. President, finally, the chairman, in the majority report of the committee, has quoted a statement by Senator Javits, submitted to the committee on September 22, 1983. The quotation contained in the report is correct, but it encompasses only the first paragraph of Senator Javits' statement made to the committee. That is to be found on pages 14 and 15 of the committee report, and I think the subsequent two paragraphs of Senator

Javits' statement are also important and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the entire statement submitted by Senator Javits to the committee be printed at this point in the RECORD.

I urge those who have noted the quotation from it in the report also to take note of the other two paragraphs that Senator Javits provided to the committee with his views on the current situation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JAVITS, SEPTEMBER 22, 1983

The Administration and the Congress have each gained a major point in the proposed compromise on the War Powers Resolution. Congress has established the proposition that it may set the clock running under the resolution even if the President does not trigger it by giving the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution when U.S. troops are deployed abroad into hostilities or the imminent threat of them. The President has gained the point that for the situation in Lebanon the authority Congress gives him to continue their involvement must be by joint not concurrent resolution, thereby, requiring the President's signature. This compromise avoids a constitutional crisis at this juncture. Though it may not settle the issue, it is an important step along the way.

The length of the time which is covered, 18 months, within which time the President in effect continues his exculsive control over the incidence of "war" notwithstanding the exclusive grant of power to declare war to the Congress under Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution, is excessive in so perplexing a situation, such as Lebanon, and disappointing, but there are some countervailing elements in the other terms of the compromise. The Congress may (again by joint not concurrent resolution) direct a sooner withdrawal of the Marines and the Marines continue in Lebanon only as part of a multinational force and in their present numbers.

The political question will still remain before the country as to the exclusivity of the power of Congress to deal with war. I believe the force of public opinion would back the Congress and heavily influence the President's decision whether or not to veto any such joint resolution for the earlier withdrawal of the Marines or would sustain the Congress in an override or in acting by concurrent resolution. The constitutional issue is and will continue to be very much the question until the division of these powers as defined by the Constitution is finally accepted.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I should like to first of all thank both of my colleagues, the distinguished Senator from Maryland, a member of our Foreign Relations Committee, and a very valued member, and the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for the colloquy that we have had this afternoon. I think the work of the Senator from Maryland in the committee has been of great value in helping us to find exactly what the intention of the Congress is. I think it has helped elicit from the administration clarifying statements that add to the record materially.

Taking the report of September 26 issued by the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Senate, incorporating minority and supplemental views, Calendar No. 405, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, the section beginning on page 13 with the sentence "that provision was adopted after very careful deliberation by this committee and on the basis of very clear assurances by the Reagan administration that it would seek authorization for that purpose," through the middle of page 14, a letter from Deputy Secretary Kenneth Dam.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That provision was adopted after very careful deliberation by this Committee and on the basis of very clear assurance by the Reagan Administration that it would seek an authorization for that purpose. However, it is true, as the legislative history of this provision clearly reveals, that Congress did not insist upon specific prior authorization for any such expansion in numbers or role. The issue of prior authorization was a principal subject of discussion in the Committee and on the House side. The Administration strongly opposed any such requirement and, in the end, the Congress did not insist upon it. The following statement by Congressman Hamilton during the final debate on June 1 on a House-Senate compromise version of the bill, described the congressional interpretation of this provision:

The requirement for congressional authorization is not meant to impede the performance of the limited functions currently being performed by the U.S. Marines in Beirut or to interfere with their ability to defend themselves if attacked. However, any decision to expand significantly the role in Lebanon of United States Armed Forces would require statutory authorization.

If possible, the President should obtain authorization from the Congress before any significant change is made in the size or role of the U.S. forces in Lebanon. The Congress is aware, however, that in order to promote peace within Lebanon and fulfill international commitments, the deployment of a new or expanded peacekeeping force involving U.S. forces might be necessary prior to final passage of congressional authorization. However, congressional action should be obtained at the earliest possible time. In any case, the Congress expects full consultations by the executive branch with the Congress in a timely fashion should any change be contemplated in the size or role of U.S. forces in Lebanon, including any change in conjunction with the creation of a new peacekeeping force.

In its own final deliberations on this provision, the Committee acted on the basis of assurances contained in an April 20 letter from Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam:

THE DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., April 20, 1983.

Hon. CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that the House Foreign Affairs Committee has adopted an amendment to the Lebanon supplemental which provides that the President shall obtain statutory authorization from the Congress with respect to the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into Lebanon in conjunction with agreements for the withdrawal of foreign forces and the creation of a new multinational force. I understand that this language was deliberately drafted so as not to interfere with the President's ability to begin such an introduction, if circumstances urgently require it, while Congress is considering his request for statutory authorization.

Under these circumstances, the HFAC amendment correctly described what this administration intends to do, is consistent with what we have done in comparable situations in the past (such as the Sinai Multinational Force), and is therefore acceptable to us. It is our intention to seek authorization from Congress as soon as possible following the completion of the ongoing negotiations, and we trust that Congress and the executive branch would then work expeditiously together with the objective of obtaining such authorization, if at all possible, prior to such new deployments.

I strongly hope that your committee will not find it necessary to deal with this question in the context of section 4(a)(1) of the war powers resolution. It would be highly premature and unwise, and potentially damaging to the integrity of the resolution, for Congress to prejudge the possible applicability of that section to future arrangements which have not yet been negotiated and future circumstances which cannot yet be predicted. Such an action, which would amount to a public finding that U.S. forces will be exposed to an imminent risk of involvement in hostilities, is in no way a foregone conclusion, and could give entirely the wrong public impression as to what results these negotiations are intended to produce. Surely it would be far preferable for Congress to reserve judgment on this matter (as we will) until it can evaluate the circumstances as they develop, knowing that the provisions of the war powers resolution will, of course, remain available.

I appreciate this opportunity to comment on your committee's work, and hope that we can arrive at a result which accommodates our mutual interests in this matter.

Sincerely,

KENNETH W. DAM.

The Committee expects that the commitments made the Administration on this point will be kept.

Mr. PERCY. I would merely like to ask my distinguished colleague from Kentucky one question. There has been a dramatic change since that cease-fire came into effect. Just as in every cease-fire, even the one that was a fairly successful one from July 1981 to June 1982 between Lebanon and Israel, could fail to hold. All sides do seem to agree today that the cease-fire is holding with a few exceptions. And it is totally different than the situation just a few days ago. The Beirut Airport is expected to reopen for some traffic this Thursday, and that is a forward step.

My question to my distinguished colleague is: Would the Senator really insist or suggest that boundary lines be drawn around our U.S. peacekeeping force in Lebanon today? Clearly, the area of operation of our forces is defined as the Beirut area, which does not extend to the borders of Syria or the borders of Israel. It is a confined area that those troops are directed to stay in and that they have actually stayed in.

Does the Senator feel that we should clearly define border lines over which those troops cannot go? And does he feel that would be in the security interests of those troops and would it be in the interests of the peacekeeping mission of the United States, Italy, the United Kingdom, and the forces of France?

Mr. FORD. I say to my distinguished colleague that it is very difficult to answer his question when we do not know what the circumstance is. It has never been clearly delineated to the Congress. The President of the United States has never told us—maybe he has told the Senator privately, but he has never told anyone publicly—what the mission in Lebanon is. The Senator drew the line around Beirut, I did not.

We hear that it is to return a stable government to all of Lebanon and to get all of the troops out of there. But that is what we hear, that is not what we have laid out to us here in Congress as the mission.

Let me turn it around and ask the distinguished chairman if he looks at the last line of the first page of the "Dear Chuck" letter, what if circumstances change and require any substantial expansion? What is substantial expansion? What is the number? What is the role?

Well, we have never set out a role yet. We have never had a mission defined for us. I do not know what a substantial increase of troops is as it relates to this letter; the number of troops, the change in the role.

When they were there a year ago—we have had two occasions to send troops, now I think we have three: one, to escort the PLO out; two, to go in as a peacekeeping force, part of one; and now in hostilities.

Well, when the commander of the area signs the authorization that the troops there will get hazardous-duty pay, that was not when they first went in, it was after they started hostilities. So now they get hazardous-duty pay. That indicates to me that the War Powers Act was triggered.

So the Senator asks hypothetical questions: I ask hypothetical questions; All we want the President of the United States to do is lay out clearly what the mission is. Then when we know what the mission is, we can support him.

The Senator never answered my question. How long after, if this resolution is passed, when the President will have to report all of these things under the War Powers Act that the Senator says he will have to comply with?

Mr. PERCY. It has been very clearly outlined that the President will report every 3 months to the Congress as to what is being done.

Mr. FORD. When do we get the first report?

Mr. PERCY. Now what I would like to do, because my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania has been patiently waiting for one-half hour to have a short colloquy, I would like to briefly answer my distinguished colleague from Kentucky and then yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for such time as he might need to carry on an additional colloquy.

I would like to say, in concluding this section of our discussion, both of us have been writing and reading legislation for many, many years. One does not determine the authorities granted or recognized in legislation by reading the title of a bill or by reading the policy section, as I have discussed with Senator SARBANES, both of which are generally assumed to contain large portions of generalities, and sometimes even hopefulness.

The authorization provided in this resolution we have before the Senate now is clearly in sections 3 and 6. It is a limited authorization.

Now, let me read from section 3. The title is "Authorization for continued participation of U.S. Armed Forces in a multinational force in Lebanon." But the authority is in these words:

SEC. 3. The President is authorized, for purposes of section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution, to continue participation by United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon, subject to the provisions of section 6 of this joint resolution. Such participation shall be limited to performance of the functions, and shall be subject to the limitations, specified in the agreement establishing the Multinational Force in Lebanon as set forth in the exchange of letters between the Governments of the United States and Lebanon dated September 25, 1982, except that this shall not preclude such protective measures as may be necessary to ensure the safety of the Multinational Force in Lebanon.

Clearly, the authorization is given the President, as Commander in Chief, to insure the safety of the multinational forces in Lebanon. Any commander in chief would want that authority. Any Congress would give the President that kind of authority once they have committed forces into an area of imminent hostilities.

Section 6 is entitled "Duration of authorization for United States participation in the Multinational Force in Labanon."

SEC. 6. The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the eighteen-month period beginning on the date of enactement of this resolution unless the Congress extends such authorization, except that such authorization shall terminate sooner upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

And then there are three conditions under which authorization shall terminate sooner because of their enactment.

I ask unanimous consent that those three provisions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the conditions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(1) The withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) The assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) The implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

Mr. PERCY. I will conclude by reading the first part, section 7(a), "Interpretation of this resolution."

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the President from withdrawing United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon if circumstances warrant, and nothing in this joint resolution shall preclude the Congress by joint resolution from directing such a withdrawal.

So, at any time circumstances change in Lebanon, one way or another, that have an effect, adverse or favorable, to our presence in that country, the President on his own authority can withdraw them or the Congress by joint resolution can direct the President to withdraw them.

At this time, I am pleased to yield now for such colloquy as the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania would wish to carry on. I regret very much indeed that he has been delayed a half hour after the time I told him he could have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I understand the difficulties of timing in the management of this very important resolution.

As we approach the Senate vote on the pending resolution, two central considerations must be addressed: First, the authority of the President and the Congress under the Constitution and the War Powers Act to decide the scope of any U.S. military commitment in Lebanon; second, the wisdom of continuing the deployment of U.S. military forces as part of a multinational unit in Lebanon.

In my judgment, it was highly desirable for the President to agree with congressional leadership on the applicability of the War Powers Act. While the President has extensive authority as Commander in Chief under article II of the Constitution, article I vests in the Congress the responsibility to declare war and raise money for the Army and the Navy. Through extensive hostilities which have become undeclared wars in the past, we have seen congressional authority substantially diluted.

To correct that imbalance and to define further congressional authority, the War Powers Act was enacted. Given the deaths and casualties of U.S. military personnel in Lebanon and the escalated involvement of air and naval power, there is little doubt in my judgment that the operative definition of the War Powers Act was present so as to trigger congressional involvement.

Protracted conflict between the Congress under article I and the President under article II could severely damage our national interest. There is hardly time for the Federal courts to exercise their article III powers to resolve the dispute. The compromise, which accords a significant congressional role, was sound.

Our experience demonstrates the wisdom of the Founding Fathers in vesting in the Congress the ultimate authority to declare war. We learned in Vietnam, and before, that the United States could not engage in extensive military operations without substantial public support. Vietnam demonstrated that a military operation cannot be successfully conducted on a limited basis; and a military operation on a limited basis cannot be successfully fought without widespread public support.

The Congress, as our Founding Fathers understood, is much closer to the people and reflects and understands public sentiment better than the more removed executive branch. It is not only the obligation of Members of the House of Representatives to run for election every 2 years which keeps the Congress closer to the people than the President can possibly be. The pattern has developed at recesses, and for that matter frequently on weekends, for Senators and Representatives to return to their States and districts to sample public opinion. During the past 45 days, for example, I have held open house public meetings in Pennsylvania in Gettysburg, Chambersburg, Altoona, Johnstown, Greensburg, Monroeville, Butler, Mercer, Erie, York, Allentown, Wilkes-Barre, Scranton, Media, West Chester, Norristown, and Doylestown.

There is no more important function for the U.S. Government than the protection and security for our people. The first and most fundamental reason for the founding of the Federal Government was to defend the United States from foreign danger. On that central issue, the separation of powers between the President and the Congress is most fundamental; and that separation of power has been preserved by the War Powers Act.

The substantive issue of deployment of U.S. forces in Lebanon is, in my judgment, more difficult than the appropriate allocation of power between the President and Congress

While the Congress was not formally consulted, there was much more reason to support the multinational force for peacekeeping than to approve the President's decision to utilize land, sea, and airpower in an expanding Lebanon conflict.

The multinational aspect was, in itself, highly desirable. On too many occasions, the United States has had to assume worldwide responsibility, which should have been shared by other nations. The precedent of a multinational force is excellent and should be expanded to include more nations whose forces might be available to maintain the peace in other areas of the world.

The objective of peacekeeping was sharply challenged by the eruption of fighting in Lebanon which constituted the recurrence of the civil war which has plagued that nation since 1974. The marines in Lebanon were placed in an untenable situation which was strongly reminiscent of the role of U.S. fighting forces in Vietnam. Neither their purpose nor their authorization was to fight to win. There was no peace left to keep. From Vietnam, we learned the bitter lesson of the futility of passive military action which is not aggressively directed toward victory.

In my judgment, it is indispensable that the United States maintains the psychology that a deployment of forces, like multinational peacekeepers, is not irrevocable. If we are not to maintain a frame of mind that we can have a variety of options, including withdrawal, then it is even more difficult to have the initial entry.

The issue was succinctly articulated by Mr. Tim Thomas of North Huntingdon, Pa., who wrote to me:

> What is their (the peace-keeping forces) purpose in Beirut? They certainly aren't keeping the peace. I really don't understand the political reasons for our being there.

Mr. Thomas is correct in suggesting that without a peace to keep, there is no function for a peacekeeper. Unless our objective is redefined to expand our activity to fight to win a Lebanese civil war, then there is no operative policy for staying in Lebanon. There has been no serious suggestion that the United States or the multinational force should alter its objective to fighting aggressively to win the Lebanese civil war.

This issue may have been resolved by the recent cease-fire arrangement. So long as the cease-fire remains in effect, there is a peace to keep.

The potentiality for sudden change in the situation in Lebanon requires the Congress to address its commitment in the light of the possibility of a change in circumstances. While we all hope that the cease fire will be maintained, we could rapidly be confronted with an eruption of hostilities which would require a redefinition of the purpose of the multinational force.

When Secretary Shultz testified before the House of Representatives, he refused to put a limit on the marines' mission in Lebanon, notwithstanding the language of authorization for a stay of 18 months. Just as the executive is unwilling to cast a commitment in concrete because of the unpredictability of future developments, so too the Congress must be very careful on a commitment which is applicable to peacekeeping or a limited use of force while reserving congressional approval for a broader application of force which may be tantamount to a declaration of war. The Congress must be careful not to declare war by implication.

Accordingly, our authorization to the President must be tailored to the existing circumstances with a careful reservation. That we are not committing to expanded use of force which may be tantamount to an indirect authorization for a declaration of war.

Mr. President, my concern relates to the factor of a change in circumstance. The issue of approving Presidential action in placing the marines in Lebanon as a peacekeeping force is very different from approving expanded hostilities which may come into play there. Certainly, when the President placed the peacekeeping force there approximately a year ago, it was a salutary move which had a deterrent effect on war activities and the contingent might have used some minimal force to keep the peace. But when substantial hostilities broke out in the course of the last several weeks, when the marine contingent was supported by airpower and by naval power and the battleship was moved into range with its 18-inch guns and their capacity to hurl 1-ton projectiles, then that situation changed materially.

The advent of the current cease-fire is a very gratifying development which greatly strengthens the President's position and the consideration of this resolution today or for so long as there is a peace there to keep. The concern that I have, however—whether the period of time is 6 months or 18 months or 6 days or 18 days—is whether there may be a substantial change in the present circumstances and the President may commit substantial additional force to the area and the action of the Congress in approving this resolution may, in effect turn out to be a declaration of war by implication.

We are being called on here to give our approval to what the President has done. It may well be, however, that our efforts to invoke the War Powers Act will have an effect contrary to that which was intended by Congress.

Congress enacted the War Powers Act to impose some restraint on the President's actually engaging in hostilities which might equally well be defined as war without congressional authorization as required by the Constitution, which provides that only Congress has the authority to declare war. I am concerned that passing this resolution may give rise to an understanding that Congress has consented to Presidential action which may later be expanded and thus may constitute a declaration of war by implication.

I read the President's language in his letter of September 27, where he states:

> It would be my intention to seek congressional authorization as contemplated by the act, if circumstances require any substantial expansion in the number and role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon.

Who is to define where there is "substantial expansion"? The President did not deem it necessary to invoke the War Powers Act in placing the marines in Lebanon. He did not deem it necessary to invoke the War Powers Act in ordering air cover. He did not deem it necessary to invoke the War Powers Act in ordering naval support. Who is there to say that the President will deem it necessary to invoke the War Powers Act in a change of circumstances? Who is to define what constitutes a "substantial expansion in the number or role of the U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon"?

That is why, earlier today, I informally asked the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and why I ask him now, what happens when the scope of the activity is no longer peacekeeping? Where it is peacekeeping, it is easy to say what Congress has authorized. But if the situation escalates and there is perhaps a deployment of additional marines, perhaps additional use of air power, perhaps additional use of naval force, so that there is a realistic equivalent of war, what will the construction be of our passage of this resolution? Do we not face the real risk of having our action interpreted as a delegation of authority by the Congress to the President to make war?

When the distinguished chairman and I had a conversation before, we talked about delegating the power to declare war. Well, the President will not declare war, but he may make war, which is really more serious than declaring war. To make war is to carry the act out rather than to state the intention. I have grave concern that when we pass—if we pass, assuming we pass—the war powers resolution, we may be, in effect, be delegating to the President the authority to make war and that, by passing this resolution, we may in effect, be declaring war by implication.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for his incisive question. Again, I think he will add materially to public understanding of what we are attempting to accomplish by passage of the resolution that is before us.

What we are doing is taking two things into account. Probably the best way to prevent war is to have a strong defense establishment and a strong defense presence so that we prevent war. What we have are American forces in Lebanon at this time that are in a peacekeeping force. Their essential purpose is to maintain peace and bring about conditions for peace in that area. In reading the President's letter and his analysis, in talking to top administrative officials, in talking with the Commandant of the Marine Corps, in talking with foreign diplomats—and we have one of them right here now, the Ambassador from Lebanon, meeting with our colleagues, it is clear our forces are necessary for peace. Certainly, from the editorials I have seen, analyses by journalists who are in Lebanon today and have seen the effect of the cease-fire, there is no doubt in the mind of the Senator from Illinois that the very fact that the House committee by a vote of 30 to 6 and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee by a closer vote, reported out this resolution, we have contributed immensely to providing an incentive for all parties in Lebanon.

Recognizing that American forces are not going to cut and run, they are not going to walk away from their responsibilities, recognizing that Lebanon and the Middle East are areas of the world essential to the national security interests of the United States of America as well as our economic interests, I do not think we would have had a cease-fire, nor do a lot of other informed people believe we would have had a cease-fire if we had in any way indicated and sent signals to that part of the world that we were just getting tired, we did not want to assume our responsibilities, and we would not participate actively in that peacekeeping force.

I talked to those marines out there when they arrived. I was on holiday at the time, but I got out to Beirut very quickly because I felt the President and Congress ought to be a part of this operation, to welcome those marines and welcome the Italian and French peacekeeping forces as well. I think we have sent a clear signal that brought about a cease-fire that has stopped the slaughter, stopped the rocketing, stopped the machine gun fire. I do not know how long it is going to last, but the last one lasted many, many months and saved thousands of lives. I am hopeful we are now going to move forward.

Mr. THURMOND. Will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. PERCY. I shall be happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have been in a conference with the distinguished Ambassador from Lebanon. He made the statement that he was confident that we were able to obtain the cease-fire because of the show of force the United States has made in Lebanon. He is very concerned about the situation, and he thinks that the United States has rendered a great service to preserving peace in that part of the world by having the marines there. Of course, it is their hope that this resolution now pending will be passed and that this matter will give the President the right to keep them there for 18 months.

I just thought I would say that is his clear opinion. I have just talked with him. He is in conference now with a number of Senators. I felt that might be of some interest to my colleagues.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I appreciate that intervention. It is a valuable contribution. I deeply regret, once again, that all of us cannot be in the meeting with the Lebanese Ambassador at this particular time, but it is important, because of the limited time we have, that we continue this debate.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, if I may follow up with another question.

I do not disagree with anything the Senator has asserted. The presence of our forces and the multinational force has been helpful in bringing about the cease-fire. I recall when the chairman made a trip to Lebanon, and I was there a few days after him, on September 10, 1982, the day when the peacekeeping force withdrew, only later to return.

Under the current situation, since there is peace there, great justification exists for having a peacekeeping force. But I ask the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, as a matter of definition, when does "peacekeeping" change to "warmaking"?

Where you have 1,400 marines in operation and a total of somewhere between 5,000 and 6,000 soldiers of the multinational force and the Lebanese are firing at those 5,000 to 6,000 men and are killing a number of them and wounding many more—five U.S. marines killed and more than two dozen wounded, and additional casualties to other members of the multinational force—and you have the multinational force firing back, you have support from air, you have support from the Navy, at what point does "peacekeeping" shift to "warmaking"? When is there a war that has not been declared by the Congress under its exclusive constitutional responsibility?

Mr. PERCY. The Senator goes right to the heart of the very matter that caused me to introduce into the Senate the original war powers resolution, which 30 days later in his infinite wisdom Senator Javits, then working with Senator STENNIS and a number of the rest of us, turned that sense-of-the-Senate resolution into a joint resolution that could be adopted by both the House and Senate and sent as legislation, as a joint resolution to the President.

As we know, it was sent to the President, and he vetoed it. But we carried it over the veto, and it is the War Powers Act that is now the law of the land.

What we tried to take into account at that time, what I was worried about at the time I introduced my original sense-of-the-Senate resolution, was that we continually make war without declaring it. Clearly the Constitution preserved to the Congress the exclusive authority to declare war, as was made clear in eminent testimony by constitutional authorities during the hearings. The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee himself, a distinguished attorney appeared. We had brilliant testimony from the former High Commissioner of Germany, former chairman of the Chase Manhattan Bank and our friend, Jack McCloy, now an eminent attorney on international and constitutional law. There was no doubt in his mind, in the brilliant testimony he gave, as to exactly what the framers of the Constitution had in mind as they deliberated and debated and then came to the wording that they did in the Constitution.

The Constitution in article I, section 8 gives the Congress the right to declare war, but it is clear from the discussions which went on at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia that this decision was taken deliberately and with great consideration. The grant to Congress in the Constitution of the power to declare war is clear and solemn.

But as the Senator from Pennsylvania also realizes, the development of international affairs in this century and particularly since World War II has to some extent outrun the development of international and constitutional law. The U.N. Charter essentially outlaws war, except in self-defense. And as a consequence, the practice of formally declaring war as envisioned by the Founding Fathers of our Constitution has generally been abandoned. We have not resorted to that since World War II.

The United States fought in Korea and we fought in Vietnam without a formal declaration of war. Congress was asked to provide the funds and to authorize the draft and do other things in support of those conflicts, but we did not as a general and definitive question decide the issue of whether those wars were justified.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. PERCY. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. SPECTER. Was the Korean situation a war?

Mr. PERCY. If ever I have seen a situation that was war, that was it. It certainly was war to those who were out there, who were killed and maimed, and to those who are still in veterans hospitals walking around crippled. They were in the midst of a war, and they knew it. But it was never a declared war by the United States.

Mr. SPECTER. And was Vietnam a war?

Mr. PERCY. To the 500,000 U.S. forces that were combat forces in Vietnam, and to the 50,000 who never came back to this country, that was a war, no ifs, ands, or buts about it, yet it was never a declared war.

Mr. SPECTER. Going back to my earlier question, the situation in Lebanon last week with the 5,000 to 6,000 multinational forces being fired upon and firing back with air and naval support, was that a war?

Mr. PERCY. Well, they were not shooting BB's. They were not using slingshots They were using cannons. They were using big guns. They were using weapons intended for one purpose——

Mr. SPECTER. I believe the Senator is answering yes.

Mr. PERCY [continuing]. To deter, maim or kill personnel, and that is a war. But there has never been, to my knowledge, a declared war by any party in the Middle East, nor has there been a declared war in Central America or in Chad.

Mr. SPECTER. Once the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee acknowledges or expresses the judgment that it was a war in Lebanon last week, then how can we justify authorizing the President under this resolution to carry on activities which will amount to war, consistent with our exclusive constitutional responsibility to exercise that authority?

Mr. PERCY. If I could just go back to what we decided to do in 1970 before answering the question. May I relate it, because it is pertinent.

When the Members of the Congress early in the seventies considered how to exercise the clear responsibility of Congress to decide the solemn issue of war or peace, let us face it, their task was not a very easy one.

My old friend and brilliant colleague, Jacob Javits, held a press conference this morning in the Foreign Relations Committee hearing room in the Dirksen Building, a committee on which he served with such distinction for so many years. He described the difficult problem which confronted the drafters of the war powers resolution, of which he was the leading member, and he described the elements of the resolution as it emerged. It began as I wished I would be two places at once, in the hearing room of the Foreign Relations Committee and at a markup on a bill that we had been waiting for many, many months. It was crucial to the administration.

I hope Senator Javits will be able to join us tomorrow on the Senate floor to provide to his colleagues his wisdom and good judgment on this issue. I hope he will be available so we can confer with him on the authority intended by the Congress, by the Senate when we passed and adopted the War Powers Act.

I have discussed this issue with Senator Javits before joining with the majority leader in the introduction of the resolution that is before us today. I asked him for his judgment. There is no one on whom I would rather rely for advice then Senator Jack Javits. I would undercut or compromise the war powers resolution which was a creation of his brilliant mind.

His response, which was made available to all members of the Foreign Relations Committee prior to our markup, and which has been inserted in the RECORD, was as careful, as precise, and as judicious as we would all expect from this great Senator.

Let me read the first paragraph of this statement made by Senator Javits last Thursday:

> The Administration and the Congress have each gained a major point in the proposed compromise on the war powers resolution. Congress has established the proposition that it may set the clock running under the resolution even if the President does not trigger it by giving the appropriate notice under the proper section of the resolution when U.S. troops are deployed abroad into hostilities or the imminent threat of them. The President has gained the point that for the situation in Lebanon the authority Congress gives him to continue their involvement must be by joint not concurrent resolution, thereby, requiring the President's signature. This compromise avoids a constitutional crisis at this juncture. Though it may not settle the issue, it is an important step along the way.

In short, the war powers resolution was drafted in recognition that the commitment of U.S. Armed Forces to hostilities abroad had occurred and would continue to occur without declarations of war.

The resolution was an effort to modernize our procedures in order to fulfill our original constitutional responsibilities. It recognized that in the present era, there will be uses of U.S. forces which do involve hostilities or imminent hostilities, but which do not involve all-out war. The peacekeeping mission of our forces in Lebanon is one such use of our military forces. It is an essential function. It does involve hostilities. It should have to be authorized by Congress. But it would be completely inappropriate to declare war on anyone under these circumstances.

The Founding Fathers probably did not anticipate such use of the U.S. forces, but Congress did cover such a situation with the war powers resolution. We are not surrendering our responsibility in this resolution to consider the desirability of such an authorization and to vote up or down on it. It is a limited authorization, which I think is appropriate and consistent with our constitutional responsibilities.

Mr. SPECTER. I will ask a final question before yielding to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PERCY. I will be happy to take one final question and then yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SPECTER. When the Senator from Illinois said, in the statement he has just made, that it would be inappropriate to declare a war, but he has conceded earlier that the activity last week in Lebanon amounted to a war, will not we violate our oaths of office, in which we have sworn to uphold the Constitution, which empowers only Congress to declare war, if, through the passage of this resolution or otherwise, we authorize a war to be engaged in which has not been declared in accordance with our constitutional mandate?

Mr. PERCY. I would have to refer to a greater authority for a definition than the Senator from Illinois could provide—Webster, perhaps—to find out exactly what war is and how Webster defines what war is.

Certainly, our mission today in Lebanon is entirely different from our mission in World War I and World War II, certainly different from what it was in Vietnam.

In Vietnam, we had all-out battle for a sustained period of time.

In Lebanon, though we had an exchange of weapons fire of varying sizes, small and large—at sea and on land,—our exchange was done not to interdict, not to cut off, not to win victory over, not to decimate forces, but strictly for the purpose of protecting our Marines when they were fired upon and to let the forces firing upon them know that if they continued to do so they would pay a price. That price would be the destruction of the hostile personnel and the equipment.

That was the limited nature of our operation. The operation was successful. When they saw the size of the guns on the Ranger, the guns on our cruisers and our destroyers, and the presence of the battleship New Jersey, there was less of a desire to harass our Marines and endanger our Marines.

At no time did we have an intention to take or occupy any land, to put forces ashore that would seize and take any parts of Lebanon occupied by Syria, certainly not by Israel, or even by the Palestinians. It was a very limited operation.

Certainly, those sitting on the receiving end of those shells would consider themselves in a war, but suddenly we now have a cease fire. That situation is different from the one we had in World War I, World War II, South Vietnam, and South Korea.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. SPECTER. I yield.

Mr. PERCY. I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has asked some very serious questions of the chairman of the committee with respect to our responsibility as Members of the Senate.

Earlier in the exchange, the chairman of the committee quoted the statement by Senator Javits submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. That was a three-paragraph statement. What was quoted was only the first paragraph, and I should like to read the other two. I particularly say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that Senator Javits closed that statement by saying:

> The constitutional issue is and will continue to be very much the question until the division of these powers as defined by the Constitution is finally accepted.

So the Senator is putting his finger on an extremely important point here and one that was clearly recognized by Senator Javits in his statement.

While he stated in the quotation that this was an important step along the way, he then went on to say—this is the balance of his statement:

> The length of the time which is covered, 18 months, within which time the President in effect continues his exclusive control over the incidence of "war" notwithstanding the exclusive grant of power to declare war to the Congress under Article 1, Section 8 of the Constitution, is excessive in so perplexing a situation, such as Lebanon, and disappointing, but there are some countervailing elements in the other terms of the compromise. The Congress may (again by joint not concurrent resolution) direct a sooner withdrawal of the Marines and the Marines continue in Lebanon only as part of a multinational force and in their present numbers.
> The political question will still remain before the country as to the exclusivity of the power of Congress to deal with war. I believe the force of public opinion would back the Congress and heavily influence the President's decision whether or not to veto any such joint resolution for the earlier withdrawal of the Marines or would sustain the Congress in an override or in acting by concurrent resolution. The constitutional issue is and will continue to be very much the question until the division of these powers as defined by the Constitution is finally accepted.

Mr. President, I think it is obviously reasonable to conclude from the entire statement of Senator Javits that what the administration has done thus far does not comport with the requirements of the War Powers Act, and I commend the Senator from Pennsylvania for raising this important constitutional question.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I should like to make a few comments on the situation before us.

It seems to me that in coming to grips with the war powers resolution as it applies to the situation in Lebanon, and as we have been illustrating here this afternoon, we face two questions.

The first is whether the laws governing war powers are applicable to this particular situation. The second is whether Congress should express its satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the President's conduct of our policy in Lebanon. I have heard somewhat more of the latter, although it is sort of an interesting mix. So far as I am concerned, the answer to both these questions is yes: The laws governing war powers are applicable, and, yes, I believe that at this point in time we should express our satisfaction with the President's conduct of our policy in Lebanon.

I do the first on this basis: The war powers resolution, it seems to me, is nothing more than a reaffirmation of the commonsense which went into drafting the Constitution of the United States almost 200 years ago. At the time that the act was passed in 1973, overriding Presidential veto, people on both sides of the issue sort of colored the issue for the next 10 years. They viewed it as a major departure in executive-legislative relations. A great deal of television and radio time was used, and much printing ink was spilled, over the question of whether the act, on one hand, would unwisely limit the President's ability to act or, on the other hand, whether it would prevent another so-called Presidential war.

To a large extent, I have come to the conclusion that these concerns were largely traumatic rhetoric, for it is my belief that the war powers resolution simply restated what should be obvious to Americans over a couple of hundred years. It was vital, but it did not stake out a whole lot of new ground.

What is the War Powers Act? Beneath all the verbiage, it is a law requiring the President to report to and consult with Congress before introducing U.S. military forces into certain specific situations.

Beyond that, the resolution simply states that when U.S. forces are either engaged in hostilities or are in a situation where hostilities are imminent, Congress shall share with the President the responsibility for authorizing their deployment. Congress can exercise that responsibility in a number of ways. First, it can exercise its exclusive right, as is being discussed here, to declare war, and the answer to the question about war is not whether or not someone sees the guns on the Ranger or marines are killed. War is strictly a legal condition which conveys certain rights and certain responsibilities to belligerent parties in a certain circumstance.

Second, if Congress does not wish to declare war, it can nonetheless enact legislation authorizing the President to continue the deployment of U.S. troops; or, third, Congress can conditionally extend the 60-day period of time in the War Powers Act, in which the President is permitted to act more or less unilaterally after he reports and consults.

Finally, Congress has it in its power to order the withdrawal of troops, either by waiting for the statutory 60-day clock to run or by affirmatively acting earlier to withdraw those troops.

In other words, Mr. President, I have come to the conclusion that the War Powers Act is simply a reassertion of the fundamental proposition that the President's rights and powers as Commander in Chief can be fully exercised only when Congress has declared war or has otherwise created specific statutory authority to act.

In situations short of that, the President's freedom to introduce troops into situations of active or imminent hostilities are curtailed without the specific approval of Congress. Even if the President tries to avoid reporting and consulting, our authority is clear and his is limited under the act. That is as it should be.

To my mind, therefore, the essence of the War Powers Act is a statutory reminder that the constitutional power to commit troops is a power that is shared. The key word here is "shared." It is less important that the law creates a 60-day clock than that it mandates an active congressional role in matters which go to the heart of the Constitution.

The constitutional principle is clear, and it should never have required reiteration. The specific statutory elements—60-day clocks, 48-hour reporting provisions, and so forth—are simply esoterica when compared to the constitutional requirements of reporting, consultation, and shared power.

But shared power means shared responsibility. We should remember that the passage of the War Powers Act was necessitated at least as much by the failure of Congress to perform its duties during the Vietnam war as it was by any so-called "usurpation of power by the President." If the act reasserts the obvious point that war powers are shared and that the President should consult, it is also a reminder to us in Congress that we must do our duty, just as the President must do his.

If we face a situation where American troops may be introduced into actual or imminent hostilities, it is incumbent on us in Congress to act.

Most of us believe that after August 29—the day the first marines were killed as a result of fire specifically aimed at them—the situation in Lebanon became one of at least imminent hostilities and more likely ongoing hostilities. We had, of course, already been reported to and consulted by the President at the time the Marines joined the multinational force in September 1982. With the casualties on August 29 of this year, however, our role became larger, for the war powers resolution came into full effect.

It is now incumbent on us to share with the President the responsibility for permitting or prohibiting troop deployments in a situation where Americans are being killed. The essential requirement of the War Powers Act—shared duty to decide on deployment—is being met by this debate today. So the first question—whether the war powers resolution is pertinent to this situation—can clearly be answered "yes."

In saying that, let me stress a key point. The President has thus far fully complied with every expectation of the War Powers Act. The resolution which has been offered by the majority leader was drafted with the administration's guidance and blessing. It is specific in stating that the marines and the naval task force "are now in hostilities requiring authorization of their continued presence under the war powers resolution."

There has been no attempt to evade the requirements of the law. The principle we established in 1973 is being upheld, and there is strong consensus between the Congress and the President on that point.

That is where the second question comes into play—whether or not we in this body should support the President's policy in Lebanon. Unfortunately, the debate on that question has become tangled up in the particulars of the war powers resolution. It is easy to confuse ourselves on this point.

The war powers resolution was not drafted simply to limit each and every deployment of American troops to 60 days. Congress did not believe that each and every international situation could be resolved in a mere 2 months, nor did it try to insist that our only choices as a nation were either an outright declaration of war or a statutory 2-month commitment. The 60-day provision was inserted into the War Powers Act simply in order to insure that at some point after hostilities had become imminent and powers had become shared, we—Congress, not the President—would fish or cut bait. The same purpose could have been served if the clock had been limited to 15 days or extended to 180.

In either event, the time limit would have been arbitrary in terms of a given situation at a given location. But it would nonetheless have served the key purpose—to insure that Congress takes an active role in the policies which might embroil us in a war.

The clock should be seen as a trigger for congressional decisionmaking, not simply as a brake on the President's role. It demands action on our part as much as it requires caution on his.

When Senators argue that we should limit the authority of the multinational force to a strict 60 days or any other period, they are not making a statement about the requirements of the War Powers Act. They are making a statement about what they feel our role in Lebanon should be. The issue is foreign policy, not constitutional law. If Senators choose to cloak this in the language of the War Powers Act, we should not become confused.

The War Powers Act specifically envisions that troops may be deployed in situations of imminent or actual hostilities for longer than 60 days provided that Congress assents. So in debating today whether to limit the duration of the marines to 60 days or 6 months or 18 months, we are not debating whether the War Powers Act is being observed. It is. Let us recognize that we in this body are in basic agreement with the President over the requirements of the War Powers Act, and let us get on with the job of determining how we can and should best share the responsibility for making policy in Lebanon.

In my judgment, there are a number of vital foreign policy issues which argue for sharing with the President the decision to let the marines remain committed to the multinational force for as long as circumstances dictate. If we decide to limit the intitial authority to 60 days, we will compel the President publicly to discuss a very fluid and very delicate situation 2 months from now and as often thereafter as a simple majority of us might dictate from time to time.

The cease-fire terms announced on Sunday night are a promising sign. It appears to me that the presence of the multinational force was a key element in obtaining that cease fire. We should not risk undercutting it by requiring a bimonthly debate on fundamental policy, particularly when negotiations aimed at bringing reconciliation to Lebanon are underway. We could not have expected President Carter to check in with us periodically in the midst of the negotiations at Camp David. We had to trust him to do the best he could while keeping us advised informally. Likewise, we must trust President Reagan. Policy is actively made, not mechanically followed, and the real issue is whether we are willing to let the President make it so long as we are satisfied with its general course.

Having said that, I do not want my colleagues to believe that Congress if it approves a 180-day period as provided in the resolution can then turn its attention to unrelated matters for the next year and a half.

I am not by any means advocating a retreat from our shared responsibility in the matter of war powers. The fact is that regardless of what time limit we set for initial authority on the multinational force—whether 60 days, 180 days, or 18 months—we can always recall the marines from Lebanon through passage, not of a concurrent resolution that is provided in the War Powers Act, that is under a constitutional question, as a result of recent Supreme Court decision, we can do it through a joint resolution or through a bill. Our authority and our power in this area are clear, as they always have been.

If we are fearful that 18 months is too long an initial commitment, what that really means is that we do not trust ourselves to do our jobs, not that we do not trust the President. Let us be forthright about that point: We do not jeopardize our own ability to withdraw the troops by granting the President an 18-month authority. We lose nothing. But we gain for him—and for our country—the necessary breathing space to credibly back up a commitment on which most of us seem agreed. Let us not weaken that commitment because we fear that we ourselves are incapable of acting wisely. If we lack the confidence to impose limits in the event they are called for, then we have no business sharing any power at all.

So if the situation involves a presumption that the President should have the flexibility—subject to our oversight—to make his commitment credible, let us give him that flexibility and that credibility. I think the situation in Lebanon is clearly one in which that presumption is present. If at any time during the next 18 months we should develop a fear that somehow we are entering a so-called quagmire as we did in Vietnam, we can get out. That is in our power here in Congress. But if we do not develop such fears, we will have avoided weakening the position of this country in an endeavour which is vital to our national interests.

We now know the welcome news that a cease-fire has been negotiated in Lebanon. It is a fragile thing, of course, and I will not argue that we can count on its remaining in effect forever.

But it is a tangible sign that our policies are working, and a powerful reminder of the dangers of changing those policies out of a misplaced fear that we might somehow lose control. If control is lost to the executive branch in this matter, it could just as easily be lost in 3 days as in 60, or in 60 days as in 6 months, or as in 6 months as in 18. The limits of the authority are really not the issue here. The wisdom of our policy and the willingness of this institution to assert itself should circumstances dictate are the real issues. I think our policy in Lebanon is sound, and I have enough confidence in our own commonsense to believe that we can recognize reality in the event that our policies go sour and it becomes necessary to recall the troops. In the interim, I prefer to give this country and its President the flexibility they need.

At bottom, Mr. President, the War Powers Act was a needed reminder of what the framers of the Constitution knew from direct experience: No foreign policy is sustainable unless it has the active support ans assent of the people. That is why the Constitution created a large congressional role in war powers. This sharing of the war powers actually strengthens our policy, and if the War Powers Act does nothing else it reminds us of that.

So I strongly believe that the act is a needed codification of constitutional law and commonsense, and I support its implementation. Had the President chosen not to comply, we would ourselves have been compelled to invoke the act, for inaction on the part of the Chief Executive cannot change the reality of ongoing or imminent hostilities.

When shots are fired in anger at our troops, the War Powers Act comes into effect, and nothing can alter that fact. But when it comes into effect, we must remember that our duty becomes one of sharing power and responsibility not simply watching a clock.

In a real sense, therefore, the War Powers Act requires that we ourselves face up to the responsibilities which we chose to evade and ignore during the Vietnam war. That is not an easy thing to do, for it requires us to make decisions and to share liability. But if we are to play a role larger than rubber stamp on one hand or permanent obstacle on the other, we must grit our teeth and help make policy. If that policy seems sound, then as those who share responsibility for making it we should get on with making it. If it is unsound, we should end or alter it. In this case, the policy is sound.

At all times, we should watch events carefully so that if need be we can recall the troops as contemplated in the act. But we should above all else avoid the trap of doing nothing. I fear that if we limit the authority to an arbitrarily short length of time, we will effectively be doing nothing responsible. No one ever said that the conduct of policy is easy. But if we are to live up to our own responsibilities, we must make the tough choices here and now. That is why I urge my colleagues to support the resolution offered by the majority leader and why I caution them to keep vigilant thereafter.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I wonder if my warm and distinguished friend from Minnesota would yield for a question at the conclusion of his very excellent remarks?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DIXON. A number of times during the course of the Senator's remarks, I noticed that the Senator from Minnesota expressed his view to the Senate that the President did fully comply with the War Powers Act. I would ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he stands on that statement?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Well, I believe I do. I may not be able at this second to prove it to the satisfaction of the Senator from Illinois, but it is certainly my impression.

Mr. DIXON. I do not want to demean any of the remarks of the Senator, who is a warm friend and whose point of view has always been one I felt is well made in every circumstance, but the War Powers Act, as the Senator knows, says, in section 4(a) as follows:

> the President shall submit within 48 hours to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President pro tempore of the Senate a report, in writing, setting forth—
> (A) the circumstances necessitating the introduction of United States Armed Forces;
> (B) the constitutional and legislative authority under which such introduction took place; and
> (C) the estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement.

I point out to my warm friend that, in this resolution, we find on page 2 as follows:

> The Congress determines that the requirements of section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution became operative on August 29, 1983.

Now, it is my understanding that it has been argued both by the Senator from Minnesota and my respected and warm friend, the senior Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, that this finding is correct under the War Powers Act. I would ask whether it is not the view of the Senator from Minnesota, given those circumstances, that the President should fully be required to fully comply with section 4(a) as it is stated in the War Powers Act?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Well, I guess the Senator makes a good point. It would appear to me that, as of August 29, which is the date that I used in my presentation as a triggering date for the War Powers Act, that that would be the time in which, as I very quickly now glance over the reporting requirements of section 4(a), that I would have expected the President should have made that kind of report.

Mr. DIXON. If I may pursue this further for a moment with my distinguished friend. It does not trouble this Senator that we go forward under section 6 of the War Powers Act and follow the procedures outlined there as we are doing in this resolution. I think that may be an appropriate thing to do.

What troubles this Senator, I say to my friend from Minnesota, and I say to my dear friend, the chairman of the committee that is jurisdictional here, to my senior colleague from Illinois, what troubles me is we are excusing the President from complying, as he is required to do under this section of the act.

Now, I think that is the first step that we ought to have here. If the President would come forward with a statement in writing to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House setting forth in writing now his position, I would remind the Senator that the President has said he will reluctantly sign this resolution. If he would reluctantly sign it, I presume, I say to my friend from Minnesota, that the President has read it or his advisers have read it to him.

If his advisers have read it to him or if the President of this great Nation has read it, then he knows that we say that we invoke the war powers resolution and that it became operative on August 29. If it became operative on August 29, we are waiting here with bated breath a month later for the President to comply with the simplistic directions of section 4(a)(1) of the resolution. I am still waiting. My colleagues who are concerned are still waiting. I would ask if that is too much to ask.

Now, my dear friend from Illinois read today a letter from the President directed to the majority leader. We are happy to have that information. It is enlightening to us. But I wonder why he will not just comply with the act and give us directly the information the act directs him to give us.

Mr. DURENBERGER. I cannot speak for the President, nor can I speak for anyone else here with whom there may have been a more official communication than the letter I have before me addressed to the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Honorable STROM THURMOND, and executed by Ronald Reagan on White House stationery as the President of the United States.

Now, while that letter does not specifically cite all of the subparagraph requirements of section 4, it does make reference to section 4. It does set out in that letter, in perhaps not the detail that you might anticipate being required by the statute, but it does set out a wide variety of circumstances which might, in the Senator's judgment or mine, satisfy the requirements of section 4(a) or 3(a) or however you interpret it.

Would the Senator disagree with that? I take it the Senator has a copy of the President's letter to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator find that on his desk?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I do now.

Mr. DIXON. Who gave that to the Senator?

Mr. DURENBERGER. My trusty sidekick.

Mr. DIXON. Does he have another copy?

Mr. DURENBERGER. There may be some confusion. There is a letter dated September 27 from the President on your desk today. I have in my hand what I am informed is a copy of a formal letter sent to the President pro tempore of the Senate, and it is dated August 30. I would be pleased to have it copied and deliver it to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. I would like to have that letter.

May I say I have a letter here dated September 27 to my friend, the senior Senator from Illinois, entitled "Dear Chuck." While he is my warm friend and I regard him highly, he has never held himself out to be either the President pro tempore of the Senate or the Speaker of the House. But if there is an official document such as that referred to by my friend and colleague, it has never been shown to this Senator. I have never heard it referred to in the number of discussions I have had with other colleagues who have expressed similar concerns.

Mr. DURENBERGER. We are having a copy of that document made. The copy indicated the original was on file with the Parliamentarian as of August 31, 1983.

Mr. LEVIN. Will my friend from Minnesota yield for a question while we are waiting for that to be copied?

Mr. DURENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. LEVIN. Is it the Senator's understanding that letter is intended to be Presidential compliance with the requirements of section 4(a)?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I have no idea. I do not know the answer to that question. Because I was asked the question about compliance and because I was at least privy to some of this information, I came to the conclusion that it may well have been part of the intention of the White House by officially communicating with the President pro tempore of the Senate to comply, at least pro forma, with these requirements. But whether that was their intention, I certainly cannot speak for the originator of the letter.

Mr. LEVIN. Just one additional comment or question. Would it be fair to say, though, that our colleague from Minnesota would agree that the President should comply with the reporting requirement of section 4(a)?

Mr. DURENBERGER. I would suggest that the President should and that he has.

Mr. LEVIN. If this letter the Senator is referring to is not intended to constitute compliance with section 4(a), if it is not intended by the White House to constitute such compliance, then I take it the Senator from Minnesota would agree that the President should comply with section 4(a) with a report which is intended to constitute sufficient compliance?

Mr. DURENBERGER. That is right. And I did note that my colleague from Michigan was listening intently—which is not usual around here—to my comments. And I think I did make reference to the fact that the order would make the act effective and share the responsibilities about which I spoke and the President would have to comply with the reporting and consulting requirements of the act.

Mr. LEVIN. I think the basic problem this colloquy points out is that the President does not believe he is bound by the War Powers Act. He does not seek authority from the Congress and does not believe it is necessary. I think that is the fundamental problem that we are in right now.

I am glad to hear my friend from Minnesota say that if that letter dated August 30, as I understand it, was not intended by the White House to constitute compliance with section 4(a), that he agrees that such a report should be forthcoming.

Mr. DIXON. May I pursue this further with my distinguished friend from Minnesota, or perhaps with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who is now back on the floor. Would he care to join us in this dialog?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, would it be possible for my distinguished colleague to hold up while I am temporarily off the floor?

Mr. DIXON. I wonder if I could say to my friend from Minnesota and whoever else on the other side might be within the sound of my voice, I am delighted to have this brought to my attention. It may very well be that many others knew of this letter from the President of the United States to the President pro tempore of the Senate. I wonder if the ranking Member on our side could enlighten us as to that as well as to whether this letter has been generally known to be in existence.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, is this the letter from President Reagan to Senator PERCY?

Mr. DIXON. No, I want to say to our ranking Member that I have just been engaged in a dialog with the Senator from Minnesota asking why the President did not comply with section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Act. The Senator from Minnesota now has sent to me from a man he called his reliable sidekick, I believe, a letter I have never seen before, dated August 30, 1983, from the White House to the President pro tempore of the Senate. Is the ranking Member aware of the existence of this letter, or has that been made known to us prior to this occasion?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am informed that this letter was received.

Mr. DIXON. May I say that many on this side have not known until now of the existence of this letter? I would like to pursue that to the extent that my colleague from Michigan has pursued it, to inquire whether the President suggests that this letter is his compliance, in which case, I would presume that it follows that one similar to this was sent to the Speaker of the House in connection with the War Powers Act?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, we get a good deal of mail, both in our offices and in the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not recall this particular letter, whether I have received it. The subject matter—it would help me if I could look at it and I do not have a copy of it here.

Mr. DIXON. Perhaps we shall pursue it at the moment the chairman of the committee comes back. I thank the ranking Member.

Mr. PELL. Yes, Mr. President, my memory is refreshed. We did get this letter. It is for informational purposes.

Mr. LEVIN. If I may ask my friend, the ranking member of the committee, if he will yield for a question.

Mr. PELL. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. LEVIN. Is it his understanding that this letter is intended to qualify the Presidential compliance with section 4(a)?

Mr. PELL. It is intended, but not in as specific terms as I would like.

Mr. LEVIN. But when asked, the White House says, yes, this is what was intended to comply with section 4(a)?

Mr. PELL. Yes, but this is not as specific as what the War Powers Act calls for. In their view, it is evidence of their compliance. In our view, it is a question of its being informational.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, while several here are looking at this letter, I should like to pursue this further, to suggest that I have an amendment pending which is presently at the desk that would have asked the President or directed him, really, consistent with this resolution, to comply with section 4(a)(1). I wonder whether those who speak for the administration—be it the majority leader, the chairman of the committee if it is jurisdictional, or whoever else it might be—could further clarify this matter.

I do know that this letter is directed to the President pro tempore of the Senate. It is dated August 30, within 48 hours of the date of August 29 set forth in the resolution. It may very well be that many of the Members on this side have not become aware of the fact that the President is interested in making known his compliance with the War Powers Act pursuant to section 4(a)(1). If that is the case, at least this Member would like to be enlightened about it, because I have not yet, to date, been enlightened. I have made several speeches about it and have also filed an amendment concerning it.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, when you read the letter, you read that it says not under the War Powers Act, but "consistent with section 4 of the war powers resolution." This wording, to my mind, can be taken either to indicate full compliance or a respectful bow, which I think depends on which side of the aisle we are standing on at this time.

Mr. DIXON. I concede that, Mr. President. It would be, in my judgment, a letter which falls short in some particulars of compliance as to duration of time and so forth. I am trying to find out at least whether, and perhaps the chairman of the committee can tell me, the President in this letter, which I note is dated August 30 and which I note on the copy says the original was filed with the Parliamentarian for official referral on August 31—whether, in fact, the President is seeking to lead the Congress to understand compliance with section 4(a)(1) by virtue of the letter?

Mr. SARBANES. Would the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. DIXON. I am delighted to yield to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, a representative of the Department of State was questioned on this before our committee. He really was all over the lot about it, but, in effect, they refused to characterize whether their report is a 4(a)(1) report.

I then asked him, "Well, if it is a 4(a)(1) report, then sections 5(a) and 5(b) would come into effect, because that is clearly what the War Powers Act requires." Of course, it is their view that 5(a) and 5(b) do not come into effect on the basis of this letter.

So, while they will not characterize the letter in terms of the report, it is clear to me, at least, that they do not regard it as a 4(a)(1) report, because if it is a 4(a)(1) report, clearly, sections 5(a) and 5(b) would have to apply and the President would have to, within 60 calendar days, terminate the use of the Armed Forces with respect to which such report was submitted or required to be submitted unless the Congress had done certain things.

Of course, they were also arguing at that point on the hostilities question, or the involvement into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

My own view, of course, is that we should have had a section 4(a)(1) report and that all the operative provisions of the War Powers Act should then have come into play.

As the ranking member points out, they say "and consistent with section 4 of the war powers resolution." So I think, even there, you have to read these things very carefully. That letter we got from the President today, which does not really talk about complying with the war powers resolution, talks about compliance with the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act.

Then, of course, if you read the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, at the time that the President signs it, he says "My understanding and intent remain exactly as they were when I signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act." This is a letter received on September 27, 1983.

There is a statement when he signed the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act, back on June 27 of this year, where he reserved his constitutional authority as Commander in Chief. So he is not being bound by these things. But you have to read these things very, very carefully.

Mr. DIXON. If my friend from Maryland would permit me to join in this discussion with him momentarily, he will notice in the letter that was directed to the President pro tempore—which I am hoping the administration may clarify from the standpoint of whether it is compliance with 4(a)(1) or not—that he does refer to the fact that those forces there, if I can find that letter, pursuant to his power as Commander in Chief——

Mr. SARBANES. That is right. At the end of the first paragraph in the letter, talking about the reintroduction of the troops on September 29, 1982.

Mr. DIXON. He says:

> I directed this deployment pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief of the United States armed forces.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I might say to the Senator that a clear majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, later in the year, wrote to the President with respect to that deployment saying that he ought to come to Congress and consult. It was the strong feeling of many of us that the war powers resolution ought to be invoked at that time.

Mr. DIXON. I wonder if my friend from Maryland, whose opinion I regard so highly, could enlighten me on what the President means when he says this:

> In light of recent events, I am providing this further report on the deployment, in accordance with my desire that Congress continue to be informed on this matter, and consistent—not in compliance, you will note—

consistent with section 4 of the War Powers Resolution.

Does the Senator believe that that suggests that the President is telling us that he is complying with section 4(a) as is required in the War Powers Act? Or is the President simply saying that he recognizes the existence of it without indicating to us he is complying with it?

Mr. SARBANES. I think the latter. I do not think he is complying with it. I think that has been one of the difficulties all along.

Mr. DIXON. I wonder whether my friend and senior colleague from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, would be kind enough to yield on that question, Mr. President?

Could my friend from Illinois enlighten us, in connection with the letter of August 30 to the President pro tempore of the Senate, is it the view of the administration that the President is complying with section 4(a) of the War Powers Act here, the requirements of that act? They tell us, A, the circumstances necessitate the introduction of United States Armed Forces; B, the constitutional legislative authority under which such introduction took place; and C, the estimated scope of the hostilities which indicate involvement. Has the chairman been advised one way or another by the administration?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I say to my distinguished colleague, President Reagan has done exactly as President Carter did when he wrote to the Congress of the United States with respect to application of the war powers resolution to his use of force in Iran for the rescue of our diplomats there. He said that he was reporting to Congress: "consistent with the War Powers Resolution." So, President Reagan's use of that phrase is exactly as President Carter and his legal advisers suggested in 1980.

Mr. DIXON. Would it then be the answer of the chairman that it is the view of the chairman that the President is following section 4(a) of the War Powers Act and that this letter is intended to be in compliance with that act?

Mr. PERCY. That is right. I simply say that the administration believes that it is acting consistent with the war powers resolution; but in any event, we have reached the point where we now must act to resolve the basic question of whether and under what terms our forces will be authorized and continue their presence in Lebanon.

That is the real situation we are dealing with right now. We should not insist on pursuing a needless confrontation with the President.

He is trying to avoid that—certainly the leadership of the House and the Senate are trying to avoid that—at the risk of endangering our policies in the Middle East and the safety of our forces.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. I think it is important to get on the record the expansion of the role of our troops in Lebanon, and it is reflected in these two letters of the President. The letter of August 30, 1983, to the President pro tempore of the Senate—the President says in the closing paragraph of that letter:

I believe that the continued presence of these U.S. forces in Lebanon is essential to the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon. It is still not possible to predict the duration of the presence of these forces in Lebanon; we will continue to assess this question in the light of progress toward this objective.

The objective being restoring the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 30, 1983.

The Honorable STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore of the Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On September 29, 1982, I reported to you concerning the introduction of United States Armed Forces in Lebanon to participate in the Multinational Force (MNF) requested by the Government of Lebanon. The presence of this Force was designed to facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority, and thereby further the efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence that had tragically recurred. I directed this deployment pursuant to my constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armed Forces.

We have periodically provided Congress with updated information on the activities of these forces and on the circumstances of their deployment in Lebanon. In light of recent events, I am providing this further report on the deployment, in accordance with my desire that Congress continue to be informed on this matter, and consistent with Section 4 of the War Powers Resolution.

On August 28, sporadic fighting between Lebanese Armed Forces and various armed factions took place in South Beirut; from time to time during the course of this fighting, positions in the vicinity of the Beirut airport manned by U.S. Marines of the MNF came under small-arms fire (without injury to U.S. personnel), and this fire was returned. On August 29, fighting erupted again. Marine positions came under mortar, rocket, and small-arms fire, with the result that two Marines were killed and fourteen wounded. In addition, several artillery rounds fell near the U.S.S. Iwo Jima (an amphibious support vessel lying offshore), with no resulting damage or injuries. As contemplated by their rules of engagement, U.S. Marines returned fire with artillery, small arms, and, in one instance, rocket fire from a helicopter gunship. There were additional exchanges of fire earlier today, August 30, without injury to U.S. personnel.

Later today, a ceasefire came into effect in the area in which the Marines were deployed, and firing on Marine positions ceased. Diplomatic efforts are underway to extend this ceasefire. In the meantime, U.S. forces will be prepared to exercise their right of self-defense should such attacks recur.

I believe that the continued presence of these U.S. forces in Lebanon is essential to the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon. It is still not possible to predict the duration of the presence of these forces in Lebanon; we will continue to assess this question in the light of progress toward this objective.

I will keep the Congress informed as to further developments with respect to this situation.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. SARBANES. Now, in that letter, right at the outset he says:

On September 29, 1982, I reported to you concerning the introduction of United States armed forces in Lebanon to participate in the multinational force.

Going back to that letter of now almost a year ago, to which he made reference on August 30, 1983, the President set out a very limited role for the troops in sharp contrast to the objective which he has set out in the closing paragraph of this letter of August 30, 1983, which has just been inserted in the RECORD.

In the letter of September 29, 1982, in which he now states he reported concerning the reintroduction of our Armed Forces into Lebanon, he said this was to be a temporary multinational force. He went on to say:

In carrying out this mission, the American force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense and will be equipped accordingly.

He went on to state:

Although it is not possible at this time to predict the precise duration of the presence of U.S. forces in Beirut, our agreement with the government of Lebanon makes clear that they will be needed only for a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the current situation.

That is written September 29, 1982. It is now almost exactly 1 year later.

In that letter of a year ago the President then went on to say:

I want to emphasize that, as was the case in the deployment of U.S. forces to Lebanon in August as part of the earlier multinational force, there is no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities. They are in Lebanon at the formal request of the government of Lebanon, and our agreement with the government of Lebanon expressly rules out any combat responsibilities for the U.S. forces. All armed elements in the area have given assurances that they will refrain from hostilities and will not interfere with the activities of the multinational force.

He then goes on in that letter, because the distinguished Senator from Illinois quoted from the August 30 letter, to say:

This deployment of the U.S. armed forces is being undertaken pursuant to the President's constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander in Chief of the U.S. armed forces.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the letter from President Reagan to the President pro tempore of the Senate dated September 29, 1982, also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 29, 1982.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On September 20, 1982, the Government of Lebanon requested the Governments of France, Italy, and the United States to contribute forces to serve as a temporary Multinational Force, the presence of which will facilitate the restoration of Lebanese Government sovereignty and authority, and thereby further the efforts of the Government of Lebanon to assure the safety of persons in the area and bring to an end the violence which has tragically recurred.

In response to this request of the Government of Lebanon, I have authorized the Armed Forces of the United States to participate in this Multinational Force. In accordance with my desire that the Congress be fully informed on this matter, and consistent with the War Powers Resolution, I am hereby providing a report on the deployment and mission of these members of the United States armed forces.

On September 29, approximately 1200 Marines of a Marine Amphibious Unit began to arrive in Beirut. Their mission is to provide an interposition force at agreed locations and thereby provide the multinational presense requested by the Lebanese Government to assist it and the Lebanese Armed Forces. In carrying out this mission, the American force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense and will be equipped accordingly. These forces will operate in close coordination with the Lebanese Armed Forces, as well as with comparably sized French and Italian military contingents in the Multinational Force. Although it is not possible at this time to predict the precise duration of the presence of U.S. forces in Beirut, our agreement with the Government of Lebanon makes clear that they will be needed only for a limited period to meet the urgent requirements posed by the current situation.

I want to emphasize that, as was the case of the deployment of U.S. forces to Lebanon in August as part of the earlier multinational force, there is no intention or expectation that U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities. They are in Lebanon at the formal request of the Government of Lebanon, and our agreement with the Government of Lebanon expressly rules out any combat responsibilities for the U.S. forces. All armed elements in the area have given assurances that they will refrain from hostilities and will not interfere with the activities of the Multinational Force. Although isolated acts of violence can never be ruled out, all appropriate precautions have been taken to ensure the safety of U.S. military personnel during their temporary deployment in Lebanon.

This deployment of the United States Armed Forces is being undertaken pursuant to the President's constitutional authority with respect to the conduct of foreign relations and as Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armed Forces.

I believe that this step will support the objective of helping to restore the territorial integrity, sovereignty, and political independence of Lebanon. It is part of the continuing efforts of the United States Government to bring lasting peace to that troubled country, which has too long endured the trials of civil strife and armed conflict.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. SARBANES. I urge my colleagues to read these two letters, the one of September 29, 1982, and the one of August 30, 1983, very carefully and in particular to compare the expansion of the role for our forces which has taken place in the course of a year with respect to these two letters.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. PERCY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. PERCY. I understand that the distinguished Senator from Indiana would like to ask for time in his own right.

Mr. QUAYLE. Yes. I thank the chairman of the committee and the distinguished Senator from Illinois, my friend, for yielding time.

Mr. President, I should like for the moment to get away from the legal-technical discussion on the War Powers Act, to get away from the discussion of whether it ought to be 6 months or 18 months, and instead to talk about the policy that we have in Lebanon and to focus on that policy.

It is very difficult when one begins speaking about a policy in Lebanon to decide just where to begin. But I think for this debate, we should start when the Israeli defense forces went into Lebanon with the idea of eradicating the PLO. Their single goal was to extricate from Lebanon that terrorist group which had obviously become a sincere threat to Israel's northern border.

I have said time and again, Israel in many respects struck a blow for freedom by what they did to the PLO. They chose a military solution, and with it all of the tragedy and the human misery that goes along with such a decision. The loss of human life and all of the pain suffered by so many was certainly unfortunate, but I do believe they did do something very, very constructive. That is, from a military point of view, they crushed the PLO. This led to our first entrance into Lebanon when we were asked in August of 1982 to assist in the PLO withdrawal.

Since that time, the facts are fairly well-known. Our Marines left Beirut after being there less than 30 days. Then several events happened which led to the return of the Marines. On September 16, Bashir Gemayel was assassinated, followed shortly by the massacre in the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila, and then on September 20 the Government of Lebanon requested that the United States, the French, and the Italians contribute forces to another multinational force. The Marines went back into Lebanon, and they are still there today.

The Lebanese Government asked the United States, the French and the Italians to contribute troops, to provide a multinational force to stabilize the situation. The troops were put in Lebanon to act as a peacekeeping force and in essence to support the Gemayel government and the Lebanese Armed Forces.

We have a communication from the President on September 29 outlining his policy concerning Lebanon. About the 1,200 marines that took over the Beirut Airport he says:

In carrying out this mission, the American force will not engage in combat. It may, however, exercise the right of self-defense and will be equipped accordingly.

Furthermore, the President said: "There is no intention nor expectation that the U.S. Armed Forces will become involved in hostilities."

We all know what the situation is today. The policy at the time was to have a strong centralized Lebanese Government and the withdrawal of all foreign forces—Syrians, PLO, Israelis—and eventually, when there is stability, the multinational force would go home as well. That was the policy then, and so far as I can determine, it is the policy today.

However, much has happened since the introduction of the multinational forces in 1982 and the present situation we find ourselves in today. Thus the reason for this debate.

There is another important fact that should be mentioned. On June 27, 1983, the President signed into law the Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act. This act provides for $100 million in military aid loans and $150 million in economic aid to Lebanon. It also requires authorization by Congress for "any substantial change in the number or role of U.S. Armed Forces in Lebanon."

Mr. President, I have two problems with the current debate. First, I am not particularly enamored with the War Powers Act. As a matter of fact, I think it is a very clumsy piece of legislation. It has also been suggested—and I happen to be one of those who agree—that part of the War Powers

Act, particularly section 5, may be unconstitutional due to the recent Supreme Court determination on the legislative veto.

This resolution attempts to comply with the War Powers Act by reaching a compromise that the President and Congress can live with. And, though I am not one who is a champion of this act, it is the law of the land, and we must comply with it.

My second point, the point I have the most trouble with is the idea of a mandatory time limitation on our amendment. I think they are sometimes counterproductive and would be counterproductive in this case. My biggest problem is that I do not want to completely ratify the present policy we now have in Lebanon.

In fact, I do want to express some disenchantment with what I perceive as the continuation of a policy that has not changed over the months.

As I said, the policy and the pronouncements and the articulation of the policy today is the same as it was 1 year ago, yet many different things have happened in the past year.

It appears to me that there are three courses to choose from. We can pursue the status quo. And it is indeed my hope that the cease-fire will lead to stability and then to the objective of the administration—a strong central government and the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

If there is another outbreak of fighting; we could escalate our involvement. We could then opt—though the President says he is not going to—for a military solution in hopes of forcing the Syrians out. The Gemayel government has even called for the Syrians to withdraw.

At this point, I am not sure that anybody can explain to me how we are going to get the Syrians out of Lebanon. A military option is not even being contemplated, is not even being suggested by this Senator, and is not even being suggested by the administration. As a matter of fact, we have been told that they are not going to impose military solutions in Lebanon.

Therefore, we are left with the other option, and that is an option to withdraw. I certainly would not want to have an immediate withdrawal, with the idea that you are ducking and running under fire.

I believe that we are really approaching a time when we will have to consider and pursue policies to have what I call an organized withdrawal from Lebanon over a period of time. I believe that is the option that probably will have to be pursued. The definition of organized withdrawal can be as broad or as narrow as one interprets it, and I am inclined to give it a very broad definition at this time.

By having a vote up or down on the resolution, I say again that if the policy is the same, and it has not changed, and yet all the facts and events have changed, then I am not sure that I want to give a carte blanche endorsement to what is going on, how it has been conducted, and what I think is going to go on in the future.

I realize the seriousness of the problem we have. The Senate realizes the seriousness of the problem we are facing. It is not an easy problem. But we are left, basically, with the two options, the latter option being to pursue some sort of organized withdrawal.

I hope that as the debate goes on, perhaps we can have a more genuine focusing on what our policies really are. If, in fact, those policies are going to change to face reality, to face the reality that perhaps the 50,000 Syrians are not going to withdraw from Lebanon, and if you cannot get the 50,000 Syrians out of Lebanon, then what do you have? That is the question. That is the issue. If you cannot get the Syrians out of Lebanon, then what are going to be the policies?

Time and time again during the negotiations, I was told, "Don't worry about the Syrians. If we can get the Israelis to agree to withdraw, we will be able to get the Syrians out." That hardly proved to be the case. I do not know how many times I was told—and I know others were told—"Don't worry. If we just get the Israelis to agree to this, to a withdrawal, we will be able to get the Syrians out, because they don't want the Israelis in Lebanon any more than we do."

Assad proved to be a far tougher negotiator than we originally had anticipated. So if we cannot get the Syrians out, then what is going to be our policy in the near term? If we can get the Syrians out, I would like to know how. I would like to know how we are going to bring the leverage on Syria to get out.

There has been a cease-fire, and that is progress and I hope it continues.

However, I just wanted to be one to begin to raise the question on our policy. I do not want to get encumbered in the legal technicalities of the War Powers Act, and I want to know what is our policy in Lebanon and what should it be?

At this juncture, I, for one, am not in complete support of or in agreement with the policies that have been articulated.

Mr. President, it is not going to be an easy couple of days. I believe more of us who feel the way I do will be speaking up, will be making statements along these lines, focusing on what our policy should be, and wanting to know what they are before we endorse any kind of compromise and to say, "Go ahead; everything is well," because everything is not well. We have problems, and they are serious problems.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I rise to join those opposing Senate Joint Resolution 159 as before us. My reasons for opposing the resolution in its present form are that first, the scope of the authority intended to be given to the President is too broad and ill defined, and second, the time period for this intended authority is too long.

On the first point, I agree wholeheartedly with the minority leader's observation of a few days ago that the provision in section 3 permitting the President to undertake such protective measures as may be necessary to insure the safety of the Multilateral Force in Lebanon constitutes a loophole big enough for Amtrak to drive through. This language is so loose that almost any action taken by the President could be justified by him as necessary to protect the Multilateral Force which, I would like to remind my colleagues, consists of Italian, French, and British forces in addition to United States forces.

I also share the concern of many of my colleagues about the disturbing implications of the exchange that Senator SARBANES had with Secretary of State Shultz during the committee hearing on September 21. During that exchange, Secretary Shultz refused to concede that the authority contained in the resolution is either necessary or binding. He would not, for example, recognize the need for a new authorization if our forces are to remain in Lebanon beyond 18 months. Moreover, the wording of the resolution which is cast only in terms of Congress views on the applicability of the war powers resolution, sets the stage for the President to avow, as has already been said in his behalf he would do, that by signing the resolution he is not really bound by the war powers resolution.

Thus, by passing the Baker-Percy resolution, the Congress would permit the President to claim that he is operating with full congressional sanction while at the same time denying that Congress has the legal authority to determine whether or for how long U.S. forces are to remain in Lebanon. That, Mr. President, brings back painful memories to me of the blank check authority that the Congress gave to President Johnson in the Gulf of Tonkin resolution of 1964. This, however, is an 18-month Gulf of Tonkin resolution which is better but still I believe not correct.

My concern in this regard is heightened by a statement made over the weekend by Secretary Shultz. He said that U.S. forces should remain in Lebanon until there is stability in that country. But except for the period between the two world wars, there has been no real stability in Lebanon from the time of the Crusades a good many centuries ago. Secretary Shultz also said that our marines could have a role in Lebanon even after all foreign forces have left Lebanon and after the Lebanese Armed Forces have taken charge in all of Lebanon. A senior administration official, quoted in the New York Times of September 25, admitted that Secretary Shultz's statements "could mean an indefinite commitment to remain * * *." Thus, the Congress is on notice that a commitment beyond 18 months and very likely beyond the geographical area currently limited to the Beirut area is contemplated. If the Congress does not demand to know exactly what the role of U.S. forces in Lebanon is going to be, I fear that the administration will make new commitments to the Lebanese Government that the Congress would be hard put not to support whether we like them or not. In short, we should know a lot more about exactly what the President intends the marines to do before we participate in an action putting the lives of American marines at risk.

My second reason for opposing this resolution is the long time period authorized for the U.S. presence in Lebanon. Because of the administration's evasiveness on the legal effect of the 18-month authorization, the Congress should attempt to resolve that issue as soon as possible; and 6 months would be a reasonable time in my view to do that. Even if there were no question about whether the administration is bound by the 18-month stipulation, I believe that a 6-month authorization would be preferable.

Despite the announcement of a cease-fire in Lebanon, the situation in that country is highly volatile; and it would be prudent on our part to review the bidding on the U.S. presence sooner rather than later. It has been argued that a 6-month authorization would endanger our marines by inviting attacks on them in an effort to undermine the American public's support for their presence. I find this argument unpersuasive, for it could also be argued that it is the prospect of a long-term U.S. presence with no clearly defined limits of activity that is most likely to provoke an attack on our marines.

If the administration had offered a clearly defined mission in Lebanon for the U.S. Armed Forces and had also acknowledged its legal obligations under the war powers resolution, such a limited authorization might be unnecessary. But if the Baker-Percy formulation is to be adopted, it should certainly stipulate a duration short enough to require Congress to review soon the crucial questions surrounding the American involvement in Lebanon.

For these reasons, I proposed in the Foreign Relations Committee that the authorization be for 6 months instead of 18 months. The committee initially adopted my amendment. However, my amendment was reconsidered and then defeated. In the absence of a shortened period of authorization or some other measure to improve the resolution, I cannot support it.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I just consulted with the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee. On our side as well as on his side, we know of no further Senators who wish to speak today.

We wish to certainly indicate at this time the floor is available for Senators who wish to come down to speak. They should indicate immediately by telephoning the Cloak Room that they intend to come down so that we can keep the Senate in session.

We do not want to cut anyone off. On the other hand, we do not want to needlessly stay in session if there is no further business to be conducted on the war powers resolution.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS UNTIL 9:40 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there is an order, I understand, for tomorrow morning. I ask unanimous consent that the time for routine morning business be stated in that order not to extend beyond 9:40 a.m. with statements therein limited to 1 minute each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HENRY M. JACKSON FOUNDATION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a bill (S. 1894) and ask unanimous consent that it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Is this the bill that designates the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine as the Henry M. Jackson Foundation?

Mr. STEVENS. It is that bill.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senator NUNN, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, and all other members of the committee, I am introducing today legislation that will rename the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine for Senator Henry M. Jackson of Washington. On May 27, 1983, President Reagan signed into law S. 653 which created the Foundation. That legislation was authored by Senator Jackson, and its purpose was to attract private contributions for the use of the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences and for research related to military medicine.

Senator Jackson had written S. 653 to provide that four of the members of the Council of Directors of the Foundation would be the chairman and ranking minority members of the Committees on Armed Services in the House and the Senate. I personally think that he included this particular provision because he himself was looking forward with great interest to being a member of the Council and to assisting the Foundation in its work. It is noteworthy that this would not have been service in Senator Jackson's official capacity as a U.S. Senator, but would have been an activity in support of a private charitable foundation whose work Senator Jackson wanted to further. I think that it is indicative of the kind of person that Senator Jackson was that he would want to give of his own limited time to assist a worthy cause like this one.

Since Senator Jackson authored the legislation to create the Foundation, I think it would be particularly appropriate that the Foundation be named for him. In this way, there will be a permanent identification of his interest in military medicine and his support for the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences.

Since this measure is cosponsored by all members of the Armed Services Committee, I urge my colleagues to pass this legislation and to send it to the House of Representatives as soon as possible.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join Senator TOWER in introducing on behalf of all of our colleagues on the Armed Services Committee a bill to rename the "Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine" the "Henry M. Jackson Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine."

The Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine is a nonprofit, charitable, educational, and research foundation supporting the purposes of the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences. The legislation establishing this foundation was passed by the Congress earlier this year. This legislation was drafted and introduced by Senator Jackson, and its passage was due in large part to his personal interest and attention.

Senator Jackson approached all his work with a youthful energy, but he had a special intellectual fascination with the field of medicine. Throughout his lifetime, he delighted at advancements in medicine that led to higher quality health care for all Americans. As a legislator, he helped with those advancements. He was proud of his legislation which put the prohibitive cost of kidney dialysis treatment within reach for all those in need and he continued to receive honors for the improvements in health care that came about as a result of his expansive Indian Health Care Act.

The Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine stands as one of many examples of Senator Jackson's lifelong interest and commitment to medical research and quality health care for Americans in all walks of life. Senator Jackson envisioned that the Foundation would become a center of extraordinary leadership in the field of medical research which would benefit both the military and civilian communities. And he envisioned it as a center of hope for those in need of services not yet developed. It is thus highly fitting that Congress designate this foundation the "Henry M. Jackson Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine."

Mr. President, Mrs. Jackson believes that this would be a very appropriate memorial to her husband. Dr. Jay Sanford, the president of the Uniformed Services University with which the Foundation will be affiliated, has also endorsed this measure.

I hope all Senators will join us on the Armed Services Committee in supporting this bill honoring the memory of our late revered colleague from Washington, Senator Henry Jackson.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in sponsoring this legislation to rename the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine in honor of our late colleague, Senator Henry M. Jackson. I can think of no more fitting tribute to Scoop Jackson. Many know of Scoop's contribution to our national security and defense policy. But equally impressive was his concern and dedication to the problems of our Nation's health, and in particular, to improving the quality of military medicine. Through Scoop's efforts, Congress enacted in 1972 the Uniform Services Health Profession Revitalization Act, Public Law 92-426, and established the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences. More recently, Senator Jackson was the author and driving force behind the enactment of S. 653, establishing the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine, which was signed into law May 27, 1983. The Foundation is a private, not-for-profit organization which will help support research and the search for excellence in military medicine.

Senator Jackson's interest in medicine and health was well known to all those who have worked with him during his career in the Senate. His personal physician, Col. Richard C. Dimond, M.D., who is Assistant Dean for Clinical Sciences and Associate Professor of Medicine at the Uniform Services University of the Health Sciences, summarized it best, and I would like to share his comments with my colleagues:

COMMENTS OF COL. RICHARD C. DIMOND

Senator Jackson was certainly well known for his boundless energy and enthusiasm, his incisive mind, his sense of propriety, and his love of life, family and country. Less well recognized among his many interests was his longstanding fascination with and his respect for the science and study of medicine as well as the practice and art of healing. Born in another time and place, he himself might have been a physician. He did more than marvel at the complexities of the human body for he had a genuine yearning to understand its physiology and chemistry. He refused to endorse a simplistic relationship between diagnosis and treatment, and explored the details of pharmacology and surgery while underscoring the basic principles of rational therapeutic decisions. He was genuinely interested in the problems of medical education and he recognized the process of scientific discovery, combined the art of asking meaningful questions, and the skill of answering them with meticulous certainty, a process that by its very nature was often time consuming and costly. But he also recognized that the medical profession was founded upon a sense of commitment that was inherent to the doctor-patient relationship and that the purpose of medical research was its translation into the art of healing.

In view of his genuine concern for this country and his fascination with medicine, it is not surprising that it was Senator Jackson who introduced recent legislation to establish the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine, an act designed to both promote and protect the health and well being of our uniformed services, a seemingly small yet visionary act that linked the strength and health of our country with its future.

Mr. President, the Armed Services Committee will shortly report this bill to the full Senate, and I know my colleagues will join with us in acting to pay this fitting tribute to Senator Jackson.

SENATE RESOLUTION 229 PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution on behalf of the two Senators from Rhode Island and ask that it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the resolution has to do with the America's Cup Series?

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

MILITARY CONSTRUCTION AUTHORIZATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 2972 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2972) to authorize certain construction at military installations for fiscal year 1984, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of September 19, 1983.)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the conference report now before the Senate for consideration contains the annual authorization for military construction and family housing projects to support our military forces worldwide.

The conference bill provides new authorization in the amount of $7,345,000,000, a reduction of $1.2 billion from the President's request. These reductions are necessitated by the ceilings imposed on the defense function by the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget. While I personally dislike making reductions of this magnitude, the conference report does provide authorization for the most critical projects and will provide for making some progress against the $50 billion military construction backlog.

The details of the bill are included in the statement of managers and I invite my colleagues' attention to the conference report for more information. Let me highlight a few of the key provisions:

The conference bill authorizes the construction of about $600 million in projects to be built only with prior-year appropriations or savings. Competition in the construction industry has resulted in extremely good bids for military construction projects previously authorized and all of the services are generating savings which will be available for expenditure during the next fiscal year. This approach was used last year and has worked quite well. Under the savings provisions of this bill, the services have an excellent incentive to seek savings because they can use the savings to build additional projects.

Two new provisions have been included to encourage the services to enter into pilot programs for the provision of military housing by the private sector. Under these provisions a private developer would enter into a long-term arrangement with the military to build, operate, and maintain housing. The developer would be reimbursed by the Government under a lease arrangement, or by the housing occupants themselves with the Government guaranteeing 97-percent occupancy of the housing. Both options are carefully drawn with language requiring that proposed programs must prove cost effective and extraordinary congressional oversight requirements are included.

In an effort to minimize the flow of U.S. dollars to other nations on overseas projects, a requirement has been included that overseas family housing will be U.S. manufactured or factory-built housing. There are many U.S. homebuilders who can make units here and ship them overseas for erection at virtually the same cost as if the same units were built by a foreign country. This provision should keep about $150 million, authorized for overseas housing, in the U.S. economy.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask my good friend, the distinguished Democratic leader, if it would meet with his concurrence if we ask the Senate to go into executive session for the purpose of considering the two nominations on the calendar, Nos. 312 and 314.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the nomination of Mr. Philip Abrams to be Under Secretary of Housing and Urban Development has been cleared on this side.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering that nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nomination will be stated.

DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philip Abrams, of Massachusetts, to be Under Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ORDER FOR DISCHARGE OF H.R. 2077

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 2077 be discharged from the Committee on Governmental Affairs and placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUT SOME SOUTH IN YOUR MOUTH

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, being a Senator from a State which bills itself as the "Heart of Dixie," I am always glad to share colorful impressions of southern life with those Members of this distinguished body who may not be fortunate enough to also hail from the Deep South.

I am sure, Mr. President, that all of my colleagues are familiar with the television actor, George "Goober" Lindsey, who has appeared on television shows such as the "Andy Griffith Show." Of course, all may not be aware that George Lindsey is a native of my home State of Alabama. He is a graduate of the University of North Alabama. He annually is in charge of a charity golf tournament in Montgomery, Ala., that raises money for charities. He also has been selected as "Alabama's Citizen of the Year" by the Alabama Cable TV Association. Not long ago, it was my pleasure to hear the singing of a song composed by this same Goober Lindsey. In his unique humorous style, Goober has succeeded in conveying a colorful and delightful impression of a bit of Southern culture.

The song's title is "Put Some South in Your Mouth," and, at this time, Mr. President, I would like to share the words of the song with my colleagues:

PUT SOME SOUTH IN YOUR MOUTH

(By George "Goober" Lindsey)

I never wrote a song before,
Couldn't make it rhyme.
But Merle and Roy and Hank and George,
They do it all the time.

Jails and love, trains and cars,
They live what they write,
Faded love and Rocky Top,
Help me make it through the night.

I can't write words like that,
I know I'll do it wrong,
But what I wrote I know real well,
And I hope you'll like my song.

CHORUS

Put some South in your mouth,
Put some Dixie in your talk,
Let me hear your Southern drawl
When you say y'all.

Put a smile on your face,
Don't forget to say the grace,
Let me hear it good and loud,
Put some South in your mouth.

I dreamed St. Peter stopped me,
Wouldn't let me in the gate.
After all my fancy words,
He said you'll just have to wait.

I know how long you've waited
And just how good you've been,
There's just one thing you must do
Before you walk on in.

Put some South in your mouth,
Put some Dixie in your talk,
Let me hear your Southern drawl
When you say Y'all.

Put a smile on your face,
Don't forget to say the grace,
Let me hear it good and loud,
Put some South in your mouth.

Put some South in your mouth,
Let me shout it good and loud,
Let me hear some good ole
Down home country slang.

Pass the cat biscuits please,
And say "more collard greens"
And that pleases any crowd,
Put some South in your mouth.

Put some South in your mouth,
Put some "Dixie in your talk,
Let me hear your Southern drawl
When you say Y'all.

Put a smile on your face,
Don't forget to say the grace,
Let me hear it good and loud,
Put some South in your mouth.

Mr. President, I wish I could do true justice to this song. I am glad, however, to be able to share these thoughts with the other Members of the Senate.

DISABILITY CONTINUATION OF BENEFITS EXTENSION

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to add my name as a cosponsor of S. 1843, which extends by 3 months the cutoff date for social security title II disability determinations under the provision allowing continued payment of benefits during the appeal process.

I received many letters from New Yorkers facing difficult situations as a result of the disability review process. It is for this reason that, last Congress, I cosponsored S. 2585, a bill to allow payment of social security disability benefits until an administrative law judge decided whether to reverse the prior benefit termination decision. S. 2585 was added as an amendment to H.R. 7093, which passed in the closing days of the lameduck session. However, the bill contained a stipulation that the continuation of benefits provision would apply only to termination decisions made before October 1, 1983. It was hoped, at that time, that Congress would enact comprehensive disability reform legislation by now.

While Congress is moving rapidly on a comprehensive disability reform package, it is unlikely that such a measure would be adopted before October 1. By extending the deadline by 3 additional months, we would alleviate any unnecessary confusion in the minds of disability recipients as to the protection offered them under the law and we would reaffirm our intention to make this provision a permanent part of the disability process.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 3:23 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, without amendment:

S. 1625 An act to amend the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act.

At 5:42 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, announced that the House has agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3263) making appropriations for military construction for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes; it recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 15, 21, 53, 55, 56, and 57 to the bill, and agrees thereto, each with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

S. 1625. An act to amend the District of Columbia Retirement Reform Act.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute:

S. 564. A bill to establish a United States Academy of Peace (Rept. No. 98-244).

By Mr. KASTEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, without amendment.

S. 1892. An original bill making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-245).

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. GARN, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

Richard L. McElheny, of Arizona, to be an Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

(The above nomination was reported from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 1889. A bill to amend the act authorizing the establishment of the Congaree Swamp National Monument to provide that at such time as the principal visitor center is established, such center shall be designated as the "Harry R. E. Hampton Visitor Center"; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 1890. A bill to provide that any widowed spouse of a former employee of the lighthouse Service may receive an annuity; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 1891. A bill to provide that interest shall be paid with respect to underpayments of social security benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. KASTEN from the Committee on Appropriations:

S. 1892. An original bill making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes; placed on the calendar.

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. ROTH, Mr. EAST, Mrs. HAWKINS, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 1893. A bill to prohibit foreign assistance to any member country of the United Nations that fails to vote in favor of resolutions deploring the Soviet attack on Korean Air Lines flight 007, or has failed to vote in favor of such resolutions already considered; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. STEVENS (for Mr. TOWER) (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. WARNER, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. COHEN, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. EAST, Mr. WILSON, Mr. NUNN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. HART, Mr. EXON, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. 1894. A bill to designate the Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine as the "Henry M. Jackson Foundation for the Advancement of Military Medicine", and for other purposes; read twice and placed on the calendar.

By Mr. BENTSEN (for himself, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. BOREN):

S. 1895. A bill to amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to provide for emergency feed assistance in natural disaster areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

By Mr. TSONGAS (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 1896. A bill to establish a Select Commission to examine the issues associated with voluntary service; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. BAKER (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. GORTON, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. TRIBLE, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LONG, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. GLENN, Mr. WILSON, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. DENTON, Mr. TOWER, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. CHILES, Mr. COHEN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. WARNER, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. NUNN, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. QUAYLE, and Mr. THURMOND):

S.J. Res. 170. Joint resolution commemorating the 25th anniversary of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; read twice and placed on the calendar.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. STEVENS (for Mr. CHAFEE) (for himself and Mr. PELL):

S. Res. 229. Resolution relating to the America's Cup yachting series; submitted and placed on the calendar.

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. Res. 230. Resolution to commend Eve Ball; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 1889. A bill to amend the act authorizing the establishment of the Congaree Swamp National Monument to provide that at such time as the principal visitor center is established, such center shall be designated as the "Harry R. E. Hampton Visitor Center"; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HARRY R. E. HAMPTON VISITOR CENTER

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation today which would name the visitor center in Congaree Swamp National Monument after one of South Carolina's great naturalists, Mr. Harry Rutledge Elliott Hampton.

Harry Hampton was born near Columbia, S.C., on July 8, 1897, and died in 1980. After earning a B.A. degree in English from the University of South Carolina, he worked as a reporter, columnist, and coeditor for the State newspaper, writing his "Woods and Water" column for more than 30 years.

Until his death, Harry Hampton worked tirelessly for the cause of conservation. In 1931, he helped create the South Carolina Game and Fish Association, and was active in the formation of the State's wildlife and marine resources department. He began his efforts on behalf of Congaree Swamp in 1954. For more than 20 years, he attended meetings, made speeches, wrote articles, and personally escorted people into the swamp to document trees, birds, and other wildlife, all to stimulate an awareness of the area's beauty and value as a prime example of a southern hardwood forested swamp.

Due in part to the efforts of Harry Hampton in building public awareness and support, Congress passed an act in 1976 establishing the Congaree Swamp National Monument. I was pleased to be the author of this legislation.

Mr. President, it is entirely fitting that, when it is completed, the visitor center in Congaree Swamp National Monument be named after this man who devoted so much of his life to making this area accessible to the American people. I commend this measure to my colleagues in the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1889

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3 of the Act approved October 18, 1976 (90 Stat. 2517), is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) At such time as the principal visitor center at such monument is established, such center shall be designated as the "Harry R. E. Hampton Visitor Center."

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 1890. As bill to provide that any widowed spouse of a former employee of the Lighthouse Service may receive an annuity; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

ANNUITIES FOR WIDOWED SPOUSES OF FORMER EMPLOYEES OF THE LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to amend the lighthouse retirement system to permit widowed spouses of former employees of the Lighthouse Service, who are not now eligible, to receive a survivor's annuity. Under current law, only widows who were married to lighthouse employees before those employees retired may receive survivor benefits. That, I believe, is unfair, and, when we compare the lighthouse retirement system to other governmental retirement programs, anachronistic as well.

The Federal lighthouse system was created by an act of Congress on August 7, 1789. There was no provision, however, for retiring lighthouse employees until 1918, when Congress established the lighthouse retirement system. That system provided benefits for lighthouse employees age 65 with 30 years of service.

The Lighthouse Service ceased to be an independent bureau under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce in 1939, when the Coast Guard took over responsibility for staffing lighthouses. Employees of the Lighthouse Service were given the choice of joining the Coast Guard or retaining civilian status. Those employees, about half the total lighthouse keepers, who retained civilian status remained in the lighthouse retirement system which was then closed to further entrants. Thus, through attrition, the lighthouse retirement system will eventually cease to exist.

In 1950, 2 years after Congress established survivor benefits for certain survivors under the civil service retirement system (CSRS), it added similar benefits to the lighthouse retirement system. Periodically, these survivors benefits were raised, and since 1967 the benefits have been increased for price inflation at the same time and the same percentage as CSRS annuities. Lighthouse widow's benefits are administered by the Office of Personnel Management (OPM).

Benefits payable to survivors under the lighthouse survivor program are financed through the civil service retirement trust fund and are totally Government funded: No employee contributions to offset retirement costs are required and retirement annuities are not reduced to provide benefits for survivors upon the death of the retiree. Lighthouse survivor benefits are $422 monthly, compared to an average of about $450 for widows of retired annuitants under CSRS. As noted, to be eligible for survivor's benefits, a widow of a lighthouse employee must have been married to the employee before retirement, and she cannot remarry and remain eligible.

The Coast Guard, in a letter to me, explained the rationale for the law by noting that the lighthouse keeper's wife frequently assisted in the performance of her husband's duties, thus implying that her survivor benefits were somehow earned. However, these survivor benefits terminate upon remarriage, a provision which implies that, first, the benefits are not earned rights, but are gratuities for women with a presumed need for them, and second, that remarriage ends the need for them.

Today, there are six retired lighthouse keepers still receiving a pension from the lighthouse retirement system, whose wives are not eligible for survivor's benefits. They live in Texas, Rhode Island, Florida, Massachusetts, Maine, and Minnesota. In addition to the 6, there are 28 more widows of retired lighthouse keepers of which the Coast Guard is aware, who do not recieve survivor's benefits because they married their husbands after they had retired.

My bill, which amends title 33, United States Code, section 771, so that any widowed spouse of a former employee of the Lighthouse Service may receive an annuity, is based on several assumptions. The first is equity. Other governmental retirement programs including Federal civil service and military have been amended to permit survivor's benefits to be extended to spouses married after retirement. In 1972, for example, Congress amended the military retirement plan by permitting retired service personnel 18 months to select a survivor annuity. Although the selection of survivor protection causes a reduction in retirement benefits, it is substantially less than what it actuarially costs, with the Government making up the difference. This is particularly relevant because lighthouse keepers became Coast Guard Servicemen after 1939, and therefore, enjoy a more generous retirement system than that of their civilian colleagues.

Second, it can be argued that the lighthouse keepers have earned the extended retirement benefits. During their service, they were poorly paid. One Texas lighthouse keeper, for example, when he retired in 1961, only made $4,806 a year. If a wife of a lighthouse keeper has presumed need for survivor's benefits, which she loses if she remarries, it is arbitrary to assume that the need no longer exists because her marriage occurred after her husband retired. The bill would also allow the lighthouse keeper's former spouse to remarry without losing her benefits in keeping with other governmental retirement programs.

Finally, the lighthouse retirement system sets no precedent because it serves a closed group whose conditions are sui generis. It appears that when the Congress liberalized other Government retirement systems, the lighthouse keepers were overlooked.

If the bill is enacted and survivor benefits are extended to 34 widows, the cost to the Government would be less than $200,000 annually. This cost would decline rapidly because the lighthouse retirement system has been closed to new entrants for over 40 years, making its remaining participants relatively advanced in age.

The Congressional Research Service, which studied the lighthouse retirement system at my request, has concluded that:

> The prohibition against survivor protection for postretirement marriages of lighthouse retirees is not without precedent, but given changes in other federal programs, . . . is somewhat anachronistic.

I believe it is time to correct that.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of the bill be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1890

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first section of the Act of August 19, 1950 (33 U.S.C. 771), is amended to read as follows:

"That where—

"(1) any former employee of the Lighthouse Service has died or shall hereafter die at a time when such former employee was receiving or was entitled to receive retirement pay under section 6 of the Act entitled 'An Act to authorize aids to navigation and for other works in the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes', approved June 20, 1918 (33 U.S.C. 763); and

"(2) such former employee is survived by a spouse or former spouse with whom such former employee was married for more than one year, such surviving spouse, and each such former spouse, if any, shall be paid $422 per month, and any additional amount payable pursuant to the Act entitled 'An Act to increase the amount of benefits payable to widows of certain former employees of the Lighthouse Service, and thereafter to provide for cost-of-living increases in benefits payable to such widows and to such former employees', approved November 29, 1967, by the Secretary of the Treasury.".●

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 1891. A bill to provide that interest shall be paid with respect to underpayments of social security benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

INTEREST ON UNDERPAYMENTS OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that will eliminate an inequity suffered by almost 5 million social security beneficiaries who are working to supplement their retirement incomes.

Under current law, the Social Security Administration (SSA) is required to review periodically the earnings histories of working beneficiaries to determine if they are eligible for decreased or increased benefits. While the SSA proceeds with dispatch to lower benefits because beneficiaries earn more than the exempt $6,600 ceiling, it is years behind in making the calculations required to raise benefits. In literally millions of cases, beneficiaries who worked at home, worked part-time, or worked sporadically for several years prior to receiving social security payments are entitled to higher benefits now than they are receiving. The SSA claims that computer foulups and changes in rules governing reporting recent work histories of benficiaries are causes of the delays. But the failure to keep the review process on schedule does not penalize SSA. It penalizes working beneficiaries who are forced to wait years before receiving adjustments in their checks.

When these adjustments are finally made, beneficiaries receive lump-sum checks for past-due benefits. But these recipients, who are deprived for years of the benefits they deserve through no fault of their own, are not compensated for the delays. A GAO report released in April 1983 revealed that up to 4 million people were affected due to the delay in processing 1979 and 1980 records alone.

Based on a statistical sample, GAO estimates that the average underpayment for primary beneficiaries in those years was $575, and the average underpayment per case, which includes spouses and dependents, was $633. Additionally, each primary beneficiary had to wait 33 months before receiving a lump-sum check.

My bill, corrects this inequity be requiring the SSA to pay a fair interest rate on delayed back payments. This is only just because the Government is holding onto money that does not belong to it. Under my bill, beneficiaries deprived of a timely social security adjustment would receive an interest payment as determined under section 6621 of the IRS Code in addition to a lump-sum payment. Section 6621 establishes the market-related rate the IRS or taxpayers now pay each other when cases concerning the overpayment or underpayment of taxes are resolved. For example, a beneficiary receiving in 1983 a $240 lump-sum payment due to work effort in 1979 that had not been credited until now would also receive approximately another $65.20 in interest. This $65 is about the additional income this beneficiary would have today if the difference between what was received each month and what should have been received had been invested at prevailing interest rates during the period of underpayment. While providing back interest is a step forward, real progress will come only when lump-sum checks are no longer made because the SSA posts the earnings records of the elderly on time. When this is achieved, no back interest payments will be made because there will be no delays. My proposal will cost nothing.

Mr. President, Congress must recognize the hardships suffered by social security beneficiaries who work to supplement their incomes. By failing to pay interest on late adjustments, the Government is robbing the elderly of money that they have earned. This injustice is compounded by the fact that millions of elderly work because they must to make ends meet during the last years of their lives. Any delays in check receipts also creates yet another disincentive for the elderly to remain in the work force and is thus a hidden form of age discrimination. My proposal will partially remedy these injustices and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. ROTH, Mr. EAST, Mrs. HAWKINS, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 1893. A bill to prohibit foreign assistance to any member country of the United Nations that fails to vote in favor of resolutions deploring the Soviet attack on Korean Air Lines flight 007, or has failed to vote in favor of such resolutions already considered; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CONDEMNING OF SOVIET UNION'S MURDEROUS ACT

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, we have heard many statements in recent weeks condemning the Soviet Union for its unwarranted and brutal attack upon Korean Air Lines passenger jet flight 007. This criminal act of aggression resulted in the death of 269 innocent men, women, and children.

While the comments we have heard thus far have contained considerable rhetoric, few concrete proposals have been put forward. The barbaric attack on this unarmed jetliner requires more than just words. Sixy-one Americans, including a Member of this Congress, were murdered in cold blood by the Soviets.

The administration thus far has taken a number of limited steps in the aftermath of this act of terrorism. At the same time, President Reagan has emphasized the importance of obtaining support from our allies, as well as from other nations of the world community, in response to the Soviets.

Two weeks ago, the United Nations Security Council demonstrated its inability to act on this issue of critical importance, not only to the United States, but to the people of every nation. In typical fashion, the United Nations has once again failed to act in a responsible manner. Despite worldwide outrage over the attack on the Korean airliner, the Security Council lacked the ability to adopt even a watered down resolution of condemnation against the U.S.S.R. Although a majority of the 15-member Council supported the resolution, the Soviet Union, Poland, Red China, Guyana, Nicaragua, and Zimbabwe were successful in blocking passage.

This action is further proof of the consistently anti-Western attitude adopted by a majority of U.N. members. A review of votes cast during the 1982 General Assembly reveals that the nations of Western Europe were in agreement with the United States 80 percent of the time. The comparable figure for Latin American countries was 38 percent, for Asian nations 26 percent, for African countries 23 percent, for nonaligned nations 22 percent, and it was a mere 8 percent for the nations of Eastern Europe.

With respect to those nations which either voted against or abstained on the Security Council resolution of condemnation, the percentage of voting agreement with the United States was as follows:

	Percent
U.S.S.R.	20.6
China	20.2
Poland	18.9
Guyana	17.5
Nicaragua	14.3
Zimbabwe	12.8

Currently, the United States provides millions of dollars of assistance to those very nations which failed to support this resolution.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent that a table containing statistics with regard to U.S. assistance to the U.S.S.R., Red China, Poland, Nicaragua, Guyana, and Zimbabwe be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] IMET $500,000; both years suspended.

Mr. President, this assistance should be stopped immediately. We can not, and must not, conduct business as usual with those who sympathize with those who commit such acts of aggression as the Soviet attack on KAL flight 7.

Therefore, I am proposing legislation today which would prohibit the United States from providing any assistance to members of the United Nations which have failed in the past to vote, or fail in the future to vote, in favor of resolutions deploring this murderous act.

By Mr. BENTSEN (for himself, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. BOREN):

S. 1895. A bill to amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to provide for emergency feed assistance in natural disaster areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

DROUGHT RELIEF

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to require the Secretary of Agriculture to use his vast discretionary authority to make needed disaster assistance available to farmers and ranchers in Texas and across the Nation. This legislation is very similar to language adopted by the House Appropriations Committee last week at the behest of Congressional TOM LOEFFLER and Congressman BILL ALEXANDER. The USDA has refused repeated requests to take action, and in the absence of such action it is my intention to press for immediate Senate passage as part of the continuing resolution or another appropriate vehicle.

This bill would allow the Secretary of Agriculture to release stocks of feed owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation for livestock feed when necessary to maintain foundation breeding herds of livestock or poultry in cases of natural disaster. Currently USDA says that these CCC-owned commodities can be released only through a Presidential disaster declaration.

In addition, it would require Secretary Block to make some form of feed assistance available. Repeated requests for such assistance have so far been refused.

This bill would also see to it that all farmers and ranchers suffering from a natural disaster could qualify for disaster assistance, whether or not their county had been declared a disaster area. Natural disasters do not follow county lines, and so there is no rational reason why disaster aid programs should be limited by these artificial constraints.

Mr. President, the CCC currently owns over 17 million bushels of corn that is classed as grade 4 or 5 and that is stored in and near the areas of Texas that are most in need of emergency livestock feed assistance. This corn was purchased in the Midwest following the Russian grain embargo and was shipped into the Texas Panhandle for storage. There it now sits, overhanging the local grain markets and costing the taxpayers about $5 million per year to store. USDA could not even use it in the payment-in-kind program because the grade was so low. This corn grades low because many of the kernels are cracked or broken from being stored and handled so much. Although it is down-graded in the market and cannot be used for export or for PIK, it is still usable for livestock feed. In fact, since these kernels would have to be rolled or otherwise broken open in order to feed it to cattle or sheep, this damage makes it even more desirable as range livestock feed.

Mr. President, this corn is desperately needed for livestock feed. West Texas ranchers are suffering through the worst drought in over 30 years. At Rankin, Tex., just about 175 miles south of those elevators full of damaged corn, there are ranches that have had only six-tenths of 1 inch of rain this year.

Those people are watching a lifetime of hard work slip through their fingers. Each day brings them a step closer to the inevitable choice—sell out for pennies on the dollar, ship their livestock to expensive pastures elsewhere, or watch them die. Traditional pasture areas in the northern panhandle are dried up also and there may be no wheat pasture this year. The spreading drought is making it increasingly difficult and expensive to find grazing elsewhere.

Many of these ranchers have already liquidated large parts of their herds. Experts estimate that cattle and sheep herds in the area hardest hit by the drought have already been reduced by 60 to 70 percent.

It is a travesty to watch drought destroy herds and ruin pastures that will take many years to recover, while at the same time spending taxpayers' money to store the grain that could get these people through to the next rain. These ranchers will buy that grain. They will transport it themselves. We do not have to pay them to take it, but we will have to keep paying that storage if we do not let them buy it.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to look closely at this legislation. You will be seeing it again very soon. The USDA has sat on this too long already. They have cost too many Texas ranchers their cattle and sheep and they have cost the taxpayers too much in useless storage payments for damaged grain. It is time to bring an end to this last legacy of the ill-advised Russian grain embargo.●

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, the legislation that my distinguished fellow Texan and I are introducing today recommends action that is long overdue. The severe drought that is plaguing farmers and ranchers in nearly 30 States has created a crisis that has weighed particularly heavy on our Nation's livestock producers. It is my hope that by introducing this legislation today, we can underline the fact that our Nation's livestock and poultry producers are facing severe problems that are unique to ranching. These problems have not been addressed by current farm programs that have assisted producers of corn, wheat and other crops. I plan to pursue adoption of the action recommended in this legislation either in this bill, or as part of other legislative initiatives that are directed toward providing a safety net for those livestock producers who have been severely impacted by this crippling drought.

We are all aware of how this drought has decimated farmland and grazing ranges in large sections of our country. Fortunately, many farmers who would have been totally devastated by a bad crop year will have much of the severity of the drought softened by their participation in the payment-in-kind program. With farmers all across the Nation receiving wheat, corn and other crops from Government surplus stocks, much of the income that they would have normally lost due to meager harvests will be made up by PIK stocks. Although the upcoming harvest will provide us with a better idea of the need for disaster assistance for farmers, PIK has already provided much needed relief.

Yet, livestock and poultry producers have received a double disaster.

Not only has the drought turned their grazing land into dust, but the combination of the PIK program and drought in the corn belt has greatly increased the price of feed grains. Greater dependence on higher costing feed grains has driven many of these livestock producers to begin liquidating their herds rather than face bankruptcy.

Yet, the most severe long-term result of this squeeze on our Nation's ranchers may come from the loss of foundational herds. These herds are developed over a period of years—through many generations of careful breeding—to become acclimated to the particular climate of the region where they graze. When ranchers must sell off foundational herds, their replacements cannot be acquired with a simple purchase of sheep or cattle from another region. The breeding process must be started anew, and ranchers must wait several years before their ranch can become productive again.

It is my view that the feed grain program that is called for in this bill will provide enough assistance to allow ranchers to hold on to their foundational herds so that our Nation's supply of livestock products will remain steady in future years. The Secretary of Agriculture is left with a broad range of discretion so that he can best determine which feed grain assistance program will prove most effective. The needs of these ranchers has gone unheeded for too long. Mr. President, I am hopeful that the Senate will be able to take action to give them a gleam of hope.●

By Mr. TSONGAS (for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 1896. A bill to establish a select commission to examine the issues associated with voluntary service; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

VOLUNTARY NATIONAL SERVICE

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a bill on behalf of myself and Senators CRANSTON, PELL, LEAHY, and LEVIN to establish a Select Commission to study the issues surrounding voluntary national service. This proposal is patterned after one I introduced several years ago which passed in the 96th Congress. Earlier this year Representative LEON PANETTA introduced a House version which was reported favorably by the House Education and Labor Committee as H.R. 1264.

We are proposing to create a 15-member Commission which would have 15 months and $750,000 to review existing voluntary service programs and to explore alternative opportunities for voluntary service. A major focus of the Commission would be youth service. General youth unemployment has reached nearly 25 percent with the figure about double that for black teenagers.

The Federal Government can no longer stand idly by as an ever-expanding portion of our youth population becomes demoralized by a feeling of uselessness. Most young people want to serve—to contribute to their communities and their Nation. However, society has failed to provide them the opportunity to do so.

A national service program would also help us meet some important needs of the present. We read daily of the Nation's crumbling infrastructure, of environmental and conservation needs going unmet, and of inadequate care for our elderly. Some of our most energetic and capable citizens are waiting to address these problems.

This is not an issue of one party or one interest group. This is a serious national problem facing tomorrow's adult population. We have asked our youth to register for the draft to serve in time of war, but we have not given them the opportunity to serve in time of peace. By not being challenged to serve, today's youth has turned inward. Increasing numbers of our youth population have turned to despair and dependence. They have the highest rate of unemployment and are more deeply involved in crime, alcoholism, drug abuse, and suicide than any other age group. It is time that we provided this age group with the opportunity to participate in constructive activity to rebuild their Nation.

This legislation does not favor any one particular form of national service program. The Commission created by this bill would consist of representatives from all groups that would be affected by a national service plan. It would fully examine our civilian and military manpower requirements, and produce recommendations. I believe that this legislation, to merely establish a select commission, is a small price to pay considering the magnitude of the problems facing American youth today. Dollar for dollar, this Select Commission would be the wisest investment we could make toward our children's future.

This Commission would not be the start of an expensive blind rush into the mobilization of our youth. This bill is, instead, a very modest proposal. It recognizes a problem, a need, and a challenge and concedes that the solution requires extensive research, diligent thought, and a sensitivity to conflicting values. I urge each of my colleagues to join in supporting the establishment of a Select Commission on National Service.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join today with my friend and colleague Senator TSONGAS in reintroducing legislation to create a Select Commission to study the issues surrounding national service. This bill is patterned after one introduced by Senator TSONGAS and me several years ago which passed in the 96th Congress. It is also virtually identical to a bill introduced in the House by Representative LEON PANETTA which was approved earlier this year by the House Education and Labor Committee.

Although national service is a concept that has been debated for more than 70 years since it was first proposed by William James, the idea has never been more relevant to our needs as a nation than it is today. The sense of public service, which historically has been so important to our development as a free society, has seriously eroded in the recent past, and has been replaced by a dangerous cynicism about involvement in national problems. Even more disturbing are the staggering dimensions of youth unemployment, which has reached nearly 50 percent for teenagers in the black community and 24.5 percent for American youth generally. Every year that our young people remain idle because of lack of work deepens their frustration and saps their sense of purpose in life. National service can channel the energy and enthusiasm of young Americans in positive, productive efforts that will benefit our entire society.

Restraints of Federal spending have inevitably left long neglected problems, especially in our cities, to simmer beneath the surface. Elderly citizens often receive insufficient food and medical care because there is no one to transport them to the doctor or to the grocery store. Shelters for the homeless are understaffed and unable to care for the growing numbers of homeless Americans concentrated in our major cities. Day care centers, which are of increasing importance to all segments of the population, are greatly understaffed. These needs and many, many more could be creatively addressed by national service.

We also confront today the continuing inadequacy of our military manpower system, and the need for an alternative that eliminates the inequities of the All-Volunteer Armed Force or the draft. There is no doubt in my mind that pressures for the reinstitution of a military draft will intensify over the next few years, fueled in part by the projected decline in the available pool of young men and women of military age. We must begin to address our future manpower needs in this area, and avoid at all costs a repetition of the inequities of the 1960's when the draft spawned a generation of young people disillusioned with government and reluctant to consider public service.

This legislation does not favor one particular form of National service over another. The 15-member Commission created by the bill would consist of representatives from all groups that would be affected by a national service plan, including young people themselves. The Commission would have 15 months and a budget of $750,000 to fully examine our civilian and military manpower requirements, and produce recommendations on the implementation of a national service program. Our hope is that a series of Commission hearings conducted throughout the country will promote a consensus of public opinion and produce the support necessary to make national service a reality.

An impressive list of national organizations, including most recently the American Legion, have endorsed the establishment of this Commission. Opinion polls have demonstrated that the majority of our young people are in favor of the concept of national service. The time for a high level study of this exciting idea is long overdue, and I urge each of my colleagues to join in supporting the establishment of a Select Commission on National Service.●

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators TSONGAS, PELL, and CRANSTON in support of legislation to establish a Select Commission to study the idea of voluntary national service. I consider national service one of the most patriotic sacrifices an American can make. This bill would be a productive step toward seeing just how accessible voluntary service opportunities are today, while providing guidelines for other worthwhile initiatives in this area.

This particular piece of legislation is not new. In fact, the bill we are introducing today closely resembles one that the Senate passed during the 96th Congress.

The Commission would have 15 members, cost $750,000, and have 15 months to study existing and alternative opportunities for voluntary service. It would have the task of analyzing all of the important work that has been done in this area, as well as raising the public's awareness to the possibilities for voluntary service.

There are a number of reasons why this Commission makes sense. Right now, youth unemployment remains at staggeringly unacceptable levels. Roughly 1 out of 4 young people is jobless. For black youths, the unemployment rate hovers around 50 percent. We are witnesses to the development of a permanent subclass of the unemployed. These are young people who have never held a steady job, and have no immediate hope of finding one. These young people are wasting the most productive years of their lives, and we as elected officials have an obligation to seek workable answers to this problem.

My concern about today's youth does not end with the chronically unemployed. I think a great many young people who have had all the opportunities I can imagine, are either forgetting, or never learned, the importance of cooperation and service in a democracy. Too many seem to think that being a member of our society simply entails reaping the benefits it has to offer.

There are encouraging signs that young people, when given the opportunity, do welcome the chance to give of themselves in State or national service. The California Conservation Corps—a modern-day version of the old CCC—is one good example.

The new CCC now employs 1,800 young Californians between the ages of 18 and 23. They plant trees, develop alternative energy projects, and help combat natural disasters. Applicants are promised "hard work, low pay, and miserable conditions." Still, there are thousands of people now on waiting lists.

I believe that countless youths would respond to voluntary service programs if given the opportunity. I see the establishment of this Commission as a meaningful step toward combatting a number of problems we can no longer afford to ignore.

Thank you.●

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) and others in introducing this bill to establish a Select Commission on Voluntary Service Opportunities. The proposed Commission would focus national attention on the need for voluntary service in this country, examine existing volunteer opportunities, and identify alternative types of national service programs that would help us as a nation deal with pressing local and national challenges such as youth unemployment, conservation of natural resources, protection of the environment, rebuilding the inner cities, education, providing services to older and disabled persons, and the scarcity of resources in a wide variety of Federal, State, and local programs and agencies.

Mr. President, I would like to note the outstanding leadership and continued personal commitment of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) to the establishment of a Select Commission to explore the desirability and feasibility of creating a national service program. I know that the Senator's own personal experiences as a Peace Corps volunteer have given him great insight into the value and importance of voluntary service programs. I have been proud to have worked with him in the last two Congresses in developing and offering similar proposals.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

In the 96th Congress, we were successful in achieving Senate passage, as title II of an unrelated bill, S. 1843, of a measure similar to the one we are proposing today. Unfortunately, House conferees insisted that these provisions not be included in the final version of the bill due to jurisdictional conflicts between various House committees.

During the last Congress, we reintroduced the bill, with minor modifications, as S. 1052. The bill was referred to the Governmental Affairs Committee where no action was taken on it. The Senate did, however, pass a sense of the Senate resolution earlier this year as an amendment to the bill making additional appropriations to meet urgent human needs—H.R. 1718—with respect to the establishment of a Presidential Commission to study the potential benefits of national service. This provision, too, was deleted in the conference on that appropriations bill.

I would also like to note that one of my colleagues from California, Congressman LEON PANETTA, has long sponsored and championed in the House companion measures to these national service bills in both the 96th and 97th Congresses. Congressman PANETTA has introduced a companion bill, H.R. 1264, in this Congress as well. H.R. 1264 has been favorably reported by the House Education and Labor Committee. I look forward to a continued joint effort with my friend in the other body.

NATIONAL NEED FOR VOLUNTARY SERVICE

Mr. President, as the author of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 and periodic amendments to it, I have had a long-standing involvement with programs that offer Americans opportunities to volunteer their services to help meet pressing human and other needs in our Nation. As chairman of the former Subcommittee on Child and Human Development for 4 years, I had the privilege of chairing hearings in which numerous individuals—academicians, scholars, service providers, representatives of various levels of government, and young people—testified about the broad support for the development of a national service program and the tremendous need for the types of services such a program would help provide.

Mr. President, it is sad to note, but nonetheless true, that due to a number of factors—increased mobility, dissolution of traditional family structures and supports, the growth of divorce rates, and the increasing number of older, single persons living alone, to name just a few such factors—many people feel estranged from their communities and their fellow citizens. We hear frequent reports of the isolation and alienation many older persons experience. We hear of young people who have become cynical and embittered about our institutions, who feel unable to make any substantial contribution to their communities and believe that they have no stake in the well-being of the world around them. I believe that development of broad-based opportunities for volunteer service can offer a way to help bridge the gap between individual citizens and their communities and can help young people and other participants find a greater sense of purpose in their lives. Such a program would also foster important intergenerational exchanges among individual participants and members of the communities they serve.

In addition to the benefits individual participants would derive from their volunteer efforts—the sense of purpose, personal enrichment, and fulfillment that come from making significant contributions to one's own community—it is no secret to those concerned about human services that there is currently a tremendous demand among potential recipients for the types of services volunteers could provide. In the past few years, we have seen record high unemployment, increase in all form of domestic violence, and budget cutbacks in most human services programs. Clearly, it is in our best interest as a nation to examine the ways in which volunteer contributions could help ease the human suffering that we know exists. The kind of person-to-person assistance that voluntary service programs can provide could offer a unique and meaningful response to the complex problems facing the Nation.

In addition, Mr. President there is one further important contribution that a national service program can make—to our military preparedness. Some argue that the All-Volunteer Force is not working and urge a return to the military draft. I have been and continue to be opposed to restoration of the draft in peacetime. However, raising the status and social desirability of voluntary service should assist the armed services in continuing to meet their personal needs without resorting to compulsion. Various surveys have shown that significant proportions of young people interested in volunteering for a national service program would select military service over nonmilitary service.

CONCLUSION

Finally, as further evidence of the widespread national support for domestic volunteer opportunities, I am pleased to note that despite strenuous efforts to eliminate the Volunteers in Service to America—VISTA—program administered by the ACTION agency—the antipoverty volunteer program with participants of all ages—the Senate recently passed S. 1129, a bill reauthorizing appropriations for it and other volunteer programs. This reaffirmation of support for this important and successful volunteer program was indeed heartening for those of us inside and outside Congress who have long recognized and supported this valuable program. We need to expand these volunteer service programs, and the Commission which would be established under the bill we are introducing today would provide an excellent forum for examining the best approach for doing this.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I believe that a national service program might well provide both the stimulus and the opportunity that Americans need to demonstrate—as they have in the past—the compassion and the generosity that have contributed to our Nation's greatness. It could create anew that sense of unity and purpose which has bound our diverse population together in years past and which seems to be missing today except in times of immediate crisis. Establishment of a Commission along the lines proposed in this measure would be an important step toward achieving these goals.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 229—RELATING TO THE AMERICA'S CUP YACHTING SERIES

Mr. STEVENS (for Mr. CHAFEE (for himself and Mr. PELL) submitted the following resolution, which was ordered placed on the calendar:

S. RES. 229

Whereas, the America's Cup series was won on Monday, September 26, 1983 by Australia's intrepid challengers, and

Whereas, the courageous American defenders demonstrated great skill in a defense requiring for the first time in the history of the Cup series a seventh race, and

Whereas, the just completed series was the most exciting in the history of cup competition, Therefore be it

Resolved, that the Senate of the United States:

Applauds the performance of the Australian challengers,

Commends the skill of the American defenders, and Anticipates that the next series will be just as exciting but hopefully with a different result.

SENATE RESOLUTION 230—COMMENDING EVE BALL

Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN) submitted the following resolution; with was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 230

Whereas Eve Ball of Ruidoso, New Mexico, is widely regarded as the "First Lady of Letters" of New Mexico;

Whereas the numerous awards and honors received by Eve Ball include the coveted Golden Spur and Golden Saddleman Awards of the Western Writers of America;

Whereas the writings of Eve Ball have contributed enormously to an American understanding and appreciation of the Apache Indian;

Whereas these and other historical pieces have been adopted as textbooks in the schools and universities of this Nation as well as Europe;

Whereas the commitment to the preservation of history compelled Eve Ball to persevere in pursuit of the facts upon which such historical pieces are based; and

Whereas at the age of ninety-four Miss Ball remains indefatigable in the zeal to recount history: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the people of the United States owe Eve Bell a tremendous debt of gratitude for writings which enrich our knowledge of the Indian, the West, and those courageous persons who settled that vast land and for the invaluable legacy such writings will be for future generations.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to Eve Ball

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a Senate resolution expressing the sense of this body that the American people owe a great debt of gratitude to Eve Ball of Ruidoso, N. Mex. Through her writings we have gained a wealth of knowledge about the Apache Indians, the land and people of the West, and the values and customs peculiar to that still vast and wild part of our Nation. In my home State of New Mexico, Eve Ball is a legend. Not only has she devoted her life to the accurate recounting of history, but she has actually lived it—spending years among the Mescalero Apaches, listening to their tales, participating in their daily lives and rituals, moving among their members in an exhaustive effort to depict them as they would see themselves. Her writings reveal this first hand knowledge and will remain among our most valuable literary treasures.

It has been said that Eve Ball's writing has not only given the study of history a new and colorful element, but has inspired others to write as well. In addition, many of her books have been adopted for use in high schools and universities in this country and abroad, which is testimony to her broad appeal as a writer. We are most fortunate to have among us a writer of great talent, generosity, and breadth of knowledge, and while her writing and insight have touched the lives of many the world over, New Mexico is lucky—and proud—to be able to claim Eve Ball as her own.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

PELL AMENDMENT NO. 2228

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. PELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159) providing statutory authorization under the war powers resolution for continued U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon in order to obtain withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon; as follows:

On page 7, line 9, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

DIXON AMENDMENTS NOS. 2229 AND 2230

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. DIXON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 159), supra; as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution, add the following:

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 9. Notwithstanding any other provision of this joint resolution, the authorization contained in sections 3 and 6 shall take effect beginning on the day after the President submits to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate the written report which is required to be submitted under section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution (50 U.S.C. 1543(a)(1)) and which the Congress finds should have been so submitted by the President not later than 48 hours after August 29, 1983.

AMENDMENT NO. 2230

Amend section 6 to read as follows:

SEC. 6. (a) The participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall be authorized for purposes of the War Powers Resolution until the end of the six-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this joint resolution.

(b) Notwithstanding the transmittal requirements of section 4 of this joint resolution, at least 60 calendar days before the expiration of the six-month period referred to in subsection (a) the President shall submit to the Congress a written report containing the information required under section 4 of this joint resolution.

(c)(1) The provisions of section 6 of the War Powers Resolution shall apply to any joint resolution or bill which—

(A) proposes to authorize the continued participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon beyond the period for which such participation is authorized by law, and

(B) is introduced not later than 60 calendar days after the submission of a report described in subsection (b), in the same manner and to the same extent as such provisions apply to a joint resolution or bill introduced pursuant to section 5(b) of the War Powers Resolution.

(2) For purposes of applying the provisions of section 6 of the War Powers Resolution pursuant to this subsection, any reference in such section to the sixty-day period specified in section 5(b) of such Resolution shall be deemed to be a reference to the sixty-day period referred to in clause (B) of paragraph (1).

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any authorization by law for participation of United States Armed Forces in the Multinational Force in Lebanon shall terminate upon the occurrence of any one of the following:

(1) the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, unless the President determines and certifies to the Congress that continued United States Armed Forces participation in the Multinational Force in Lebanon is required after such withdrawal in order to accomplish the purposes specified in the September 25, 1982, exchange of letters providing for the establishment of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(2) the assumption by the United Nations or the Government of Lebanon of the responsibilities of the Multinational Force in Lebanon; or

(3) the implementation of other effective security arrangements in the area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

U.S. REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as so often in the past, we see today a refugee crisis which is global in scope and tragic in its dimensions. Refugee problems afflict every region of the globe today and they present even greater challenges to our Nation's foreign policy and humanitarian assistance programs.

There seems to be no end in sight to the countless men, women, and children who continue to flee their homes and lands for all the reasons that lie behind the violence and conflict and persecution of our times. This past year the need for assistance and protection of refugees has grown substantially in many countries of first asylum, and there remain large numbers of refugees requiring third-country resettlement.

Refugees must be of concern to the United States, not only because of our Nation's long and proud history in welcoming the homeless to our shores, but because refugees also pose critical international and foreign policy problems. We know from recent history that massive refugee movements can unbalance peace and stability in the world as much as any arms race or political or military confrontation.

Yesterday, the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy held a hearing to review the U.S. program of assistance to refugees, and to consult with the President's representatives on the number of refugees to be admitted to the United States in 1984.

At the hearing, our distinguished colleague from Oregon, Senator HATFIELD, testified on his recent visit to Southeast Asia and his recommendations for the Indochinese refugee program.

I believe this testimony puts into perspective the dimensions of our refugee resettlement program when he notes that this past year only about 5 percent of those individuals entering the United States are refugees—a very small number and hardly justifying the negative rhetoric we have heard from many quarters.

Mr. President, I commend to the attention of the Senate the eloquent testimony of Senator HATFIELD, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR MARK O. HATFIELD BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEES POLICY

Mr. Chairman, let me first thank you for the opportunity to discuss the United States' refugee policy in the context of the consultation hearings now underway. Whenever there is an important issue within the jurisdiction of your Committee, Mr. Chairman, I can rest easy knowing that is will be dealt with in a competent and fair manner.

As you know, a great deal of my time this past year has been spent concentrating on this country's refugee policy, particularly as it pertains to Southeast Asia. Much of that work culminated in National Security Decision Directive 93, as well as in the subsequently issued guidelines now in effect in Southeast Asia. Attorney General Smith, Commissioner Nelson, Ambassador Douglas, and Mr. Purcell can stand proudly by their formidable product. Our entire exercise during the past seven months is a shining example of how government can identify a problem and solve a problem. I have never been more pleased with the state of our processing efforts in Southeast Asia than at this moment.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to underscore what other witnesses at this hearing will later state on the importance of the consultation process. I wholeheartedly support the consultation process. It is through this deliberative process that we can balance foreign policy interests with domestic interests, humanitarian interests with resource limitations, and can forge a humane, rational refugee policy that reflects these delicately struck balances. It is through the consultation process that the United States can reexamine its long-held commitment to providing hope and support for the millions of unfortunate human beings in this world who have been swept into flight by political persecution.

Mr. Chairman, as you know probably better than anyone else in the Senate, there is no political advantage whatsoever to be gained from advocating a continuation of traditionally generous refugee and immigration policies. We hear so often that "compassion fatigue" has set in across this land, and that we need to slam shut the door of entrance to the United States.

Irresponsible reporting and irresponsible politicians have blurred the distinctions between persons seeking asylum, and persons fleeing distressed economic conditions, and persons seeking to come to the U.S. to be reunited with their families.

When the important, fundamental distinctions between these groups are lost in the haze of demagoguery, the compelling reasons for why the United States accepts an identified number of human beings as refugees is lost as well. In 1983, the United States will accept for resettlement approximately 60,000 refugees. This compares with the 1983 admission levels of 420,000 for legal immigrants and at least 600,000 for illegal immigrants.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, of the approximately 1.1 million individuals entering the United States in 1983, only about five percent are entering as refugees. And who makes up this 60,000? These 60,000 are persons from all over the world who are fleeing certain suffering, and quite often, certain death. Whether from the Near East or the Middle East, Africa or Asia, these human beings who are seeking asylum have one unifying trait: they are afraid for their lives, and they have good reason to be afraid for their lives.

This consultation process focuses on the appropriate U.S. level in providing asylum to persons fleeing political persecution. There is no magic formula, and there is no way to quantify humanitarianism and balance it with the competing interests inherent in immigration and refugee policy decision-making. I do not pretend to have the magic number that will represent the "perfect balance". However, without hesitation I will state that the United States' role in providing hope for those fleeing tyranny, in providing assistance to the countries of first asylum who bear the immediate brunt of refugee migration, and in providing shelter for our appropriate share of the refugee population, must not decline.

This does not mean that the United States should admit everyone fleeing war or the threat of war. It means simply that refugee policy must not be the "whipping boy" for our country's inability to control illegal immigration. And it means that if we abandon our responsibility to uphold freedom by providing hope to those who are not free, then we have failed history and failed ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to make three specific observations. First, the Administration proposal to set the refugee ceiling at 72,000 is a continuation of the annual reductions that have occurred since the consultation process first began. Last year the ceiling was 90,000, and we admitted about 60,000. Most of this shortfall was due to our performance in Southeast Asia where only 37,500 of the 64,000 ceiling were admitted. What can the international community expect to be the actual number admitted in 1983 if the ceiling is set at 72,000? 48,000?

Mr. Chairman, speaking from my expertise on Southeast Asian politics and on my familiarity with the Royal Thai Government, we can expect drastic involuntary repatriation efforts if our commitment to refugees in the region is perceived as wavering. The new guidance and representations by our government officials concerning the residual population have kept the Thai military authorities in check despite our low 1983 departure rates. If we send a signal to them that our commitment toward resettlement will diminish again in 1984, then the predictable consequence of lost lives and strained relations with Thailand will occur. Already the Thai Government is moving people out of the camps and back to the Combodian border, and without a clear signal from Washington that we wish to maintain first asylum, more such movements can be expected.

Second, the Administration has expressed its intention to drastically reduce the refugee ceiling number in 1986. In effect, the Administration intends to have two years of processing at current levels and then to find some way to deal with the 100,000-plus-residual population left in the camps. What about our promises that there would be no residual left in Thailand and Malayasia? For those who suggest that voluntary repatriation will be a viable alternative by 1986, I suggest to them that they are hopelessly naive in their understanding of Vietnam's intentions in Cambodia. The border would not be packed with hundreds of thousands of starving Khmer citizens if Vietnam's presence in Cambodia were anything other than a colonialization effort.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me share with my colleagues on the Committee some observations from my recent trip to Bataan in the Philippines. Three days before I arrived, a boatload of refugees from Vietnam, emaciated from 51 days at sea with little food and without even a compass, landed on the shores of the Philippines. They were very lucky. The did not die along the way due to pirate attacks or rough seas. There is no need to iterate the reasons why these people, like the tens of thousands before them, fled Vietnam. By establishing a sufficient ceiling in Indochina—and I believe 50,000 is the very minimum we can establish—then the expected expansion of the Orderly Departure Program hopefully will deter Vietnamese from risking their lives on the high seas and instead will motivate them to pursue the safer channels of ODP.

Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to answer any questions the members of the Committee may have.●

DRUG ABUSE IN THE MILITARY

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, we are living in precarious times. Our political and strategic relationship with the Soviet Union grows more sensitive and volatile each day. The slightest disadvantage weighing us down can tip the scales and send the other side crashing down upon us. At no other time in history have our weapons systems been so technical and complicated. At no other time in history have we been capable of causing total world destruction with the touch of a button. At no other time in history has the soldier's job been more complex and demanding. At no other time in history have our alertness and readiness been more important.

Mr. President, it is frightening to think that the soldiers in our Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps are, like their civilian counterparts, abuse drugs on and off the job, on and off duty. These are the men and women responsible for flying helicopters and jets, driving tanks, operating nuclear submarines, handling complex and sophisticated weapons, and making decisions that affect the lives of their fellow soldiers. An apathetic and sluggish soldier on drugs almost assures that we will lose the battle.

Drug abuse in the military is a problem of paramount importance—our own particular brand of "doomsday machine."

Marihuana is the most abused drug in the military. It is used mainly by the 18-25 age group, which comprises 63 percent of our Armed Forces today. Obviously, the drug has harmful effects on our soldiers' health and the readiness of personnel. Another grave concern is that the use of marihuana is a crime and any disregard for laws, rules, and regulations undermines order and discipline in the military and further erodes readiness.

The incidence of drug abuse in the military is shockingly high. According to a 1980 DOD survey, 50 percent of the E1-E5 military population reported using marihuana. Navy personnel reported 26 percent of its E1's-E5's "high" on duty. A full 25 percent of the total E1-E5 population of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps admitted to a drug high on duty. The Air Force was conspicuously low, with 8 percent. Mr. President, I ask permission to enter three statistical tables into the RECORD at this point.

The tables follow:

Mrs. HAWKINS. By far and away, the Navy has the most serious drug-abuse problem of all the branches of the Armed Forces. According to testimony given before the House Subcommittee on the Department of Defense, "in May 1981, the crash of an EA-6B aircraft aboard the U.S.S. Nimitz dramatically focused attention in drug abuse in the Navy. Six deck hands killed during the crash showed evidence of cannabis (marihuana/hashish) in their systems. After the Secretary of the Navy advised that no trace of any drug was found in the deceased aircrew, the Navy's own investigation showed the pilot's body to contain an abnormally high dosage of an antihistamine (brompheniramine) not prescribed by a Navy doctor. Navy medical records declared that such high levels of this prescription drug can cause sedation, dizziness, double vision, and tremors. Furthermore, the Navy's own accident report stated that the high level of brompheniramine in the pilot's body, combined with other stress factors, precipitated the pilot error which caused this accident.

While some crew members argued that they had been maligned by reports of the drug use, others expressed relief that the drug-abuse issue had been uncovered. According to these sources, crew members regularly used amphetamines to sustain themselves during 18-hour workdays. This form of drug abuse was not recreational nor casual, but rather habitual. The DOD survey shows a 28-percent use of amphetamines by Navy personnel. When contrasted to the civilian population, military use of amphetamines is twice as high."

Mr. President, I request permission to insert into the RECORD at this point two articles on the subject of drug abuse in the military.

NINE IN ARMY SELECT UNIT FAIL MARIHUANA TEST

(By Mike Sager)

Nine members of the Army's select White House Guard Company have been placed on company restriction and are being reassigned after unannounced urinalysis tests revealed traces of marihuana.

The test was administered to the 50 members of 1st Platoon, E Company, 3rd Infantry. The Army White House Guard, an elite corps of 200 enlisted men who perform ceremonial duties, is attached to the Old Guard at Fort Myer, the oldest active infantry unit in the Army. The results of the March 19 tests were received the first of this week, according to Col. Jamie Walton of the public information office of the Military District of Washington.

The offending soldiers, Walton said, are now awaiting reassignment from the 3rd Infantry to other Army units. Disciplinary action in the form of nonjudicial punishment—extra duty, suspension of pay, or reduction in grade—is also pending.

Two of the soldiers, contacted yesterday, declined to be quoted by name. One, a 23-year-old private, said "I don't smoke marihuana. I'm around some people who do, but I don't smoke it myself.

"One morning they told us we were going to take a test. They handed out specimen bottles. I have no idea why they did it," the private said. The nine soldiers, he said, asked to be retested but were refused.

Attempts to reach the soldiers' commanding officer were unsuccessful.

The White House declined comment on the incident through a press spokesman yesterday.

Random urine tests for marihuana use have been administered in the armed forces, at the discretion of individual commanding officers, since the beginning of last year. However, in an effort to crack down even more heavily on drug use, the Army will begin on July 1 processing for discharge all officers, noncommissioned officers and senior enlisted soldiers found to be drug users, and all enlisted soldiers determined to be second-time drug abusers.

"Things are going to get very, very tough. The Army is putting out notice that drug use will not be tolerated," said Margaret Tackley of the Army public affairs office.

Since February 1982, when the Department of Defense began giving the urine tests to U.S. soldiers on a worldwide basis, Army spokesman Walton said, about 10 percent of those in the White House Guard tested showed signs of marihuana use and were immediately reassigned. Walton could not say how many soldiers that represented, except that it was "a small number."

A survey of drug use in the armed forces, to be released soon, shows that 22 percent of enlisted men and women use marihuana at least once a month, down from 37 percent in 1980, the Defense Department said.

"There has been a substantial decrease of drug abuse in the armed forces, and we are ascribing that to the increased use of urinalysis," said John Allen, with the department's office of health promotion.

The urine tests for marihuana, introduced commercially in 1980, are considered accurate up to 14 days after use of the drug, according to researchers at Sylva Co. of Palo Alto, Calif., the company that pioneered the commercial tests. Current technology, however, can measure neither the quantity used nor whether the user was actually high on the drug.

In addition, conflicting claims about accuracy have arisen. The National Institute on Drug Abuse claims a 95 percent or higher accuracy, and the military says its methods are virtually foolproof. But critics, like the National Organization for the Reform of Marihuana Laws, claim the tests are only 50 percent accurate and that they can also wrongly accuse someone who "passively inhaled" marihuana fumes.

Human error can be a factor as well. In 1982, for instance, the D.C. police tested recruits and found that 39 had recently used marihuana. After the recruits alleged that the bottles containing the urine samples were mislabeled, misplaced and possibly switched, 24 of the recruits were reinstated.

SEARCHING OF NAVY MAIL FOR NARCOTICS STARTING

NORFOLK, VA., Nov. 21 (UPI).—The Navy began its new policy of searching military mail Saturday, and officials said it would help stem the flow of illegal drugs and contraband to troops stationed overseas.

The policy, which allows searches and seizures of mail deemed suspicious by officials of the military Postal Service, has been criticized by sailors, who say it is an invasion of privacy.

Previously only United States Postal Service workers were allowed to inspect mail. Only mail addressed to service members overseas and sent through the Military Postal Service is subject to the new policy.

A Defense Department spokesman said Friday that an agreement, worked out between the Pentagon and the Postal Service, was adopted as a policy last month and that it extends to all branches of the military. This authority has been sought for two years as a way of keeping narcotics from reaching troops overseas.

Ship commanders and officers overseas were given immediate authority to begin inspecting and searching.

Random inspections of mailbags and parcels will be allowed, through use of metal detectors, drug-sniffing dogs, and fluoroscopes. But officials will be required to obtain a search warrant to open a letter if there is reasonable suspicion that contraband exists.

A complete statement of the parcel's opening must also be forwarded to the service's senior military postal official, Navy officials said.●

REFUGEE PROBLEMS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, reports from Central America indicate there a serious regional crisis of people—of humanitarian and refugee problems spilling across and within the borders of all the countries in the area. Nearly a million people are refugees and the numbers are still growing.

The refugee crisis in El Salvador is even worse than it was in Vietnam. At the peak of our involvement in Indochina, 8 percent of the civilians were displaced persons or refugees, whereas the number in El Salvador is now over 10 percent. And thousands upon thousands of these refugees are condemned to exist in camps with subhuman conditions as deplorable as those in Vietnam.

That the humanitarian needs of refugees have been neglected far too long in El Salvador is clearly documented in a staff report submitted to the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy. There is now an urgent need for additional food and medical assistance to deal with camps which have been allowed to fester for over a year.

The administration has talked a great deal about the need for more military aid, but we have heard little about the escalating humanitarian crisis. It makes no sense to pour millions of dollars of military assistance to El Salvador if it cannot provide basic assistance and protection to its citizens displaced by the violence and conflict for which military aid is sought.

Mr. President, I hope the administration will now finally give the humanitarian and human rights problems in Central America, but particularly in El Salvador, the priority they deserve. If they are not addressed more adequately, they will not only complicate, but perhaps undermine, efforts to achieve peace and stability in the region.

I commend to the attention of Congress the subcommittee's staff report, which was jointly filed this week by the chief counsel and minority counsel, and I ask that the summary of their findings and recommendations be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The summary follows:

REFUGEE PROBLEMS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Staff Report prepared for the use of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy)

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C., September 21, 1983.

To: Senator Alan K. Simpson, Chairman, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Policy, Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

From: Richard W. Day, Chief Counsel, Jerry M. Tinker, Minority Counsel.

At your request, we undertook a study mission to Central America to review the refugee and related humanitarian problems in the region. Between August 30 and September 10, 1983, we traveled to El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala to assess the separate, but interwoven, refugee issues, including the problems of displaced persons, questions of international humanitarian assistance, and conditions in the field. Of particular interest in El Salvador was a review of conditions that might bear on the question of whether the United States should adopt a policy of granting extended voluntary departure to Salvadorans who are not in lawful immigration status in the United States.

In El Salvador we met with the senior American officers at the U.S. Embassy and the Agency for International Development (A.I.D.) mission, U.S. military advisors in the field, and American voluntary agency personnel. We had extensive discussions with representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross, the United Nations World Food Program, the United Nations Development Program as well as with officers at many levels of the Salvadoran government, including the Minister of Interior, the Director of Immigration, and officials of the National Commission for Displaced Persons. In addition, we met with Monsignor Ricardo Urioste, Assistant to the Archbishop of El Salvador, Maria Julia Hernandez of the Archdiocese human rights monitoring organization, Tutela Legal, and Benjamin Cestoni, Executive Secretary of the newly established Human Rights Commission in El Salvador. Field visits were made to San Vicente and Morazan provinces and to displaced persons camps in and around San Salvador.

In Honduras, meetings were similarly held with U.S. Embassy officials, including Ambassador John Negroponte, with senior members of the Honduran government and military, officials of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, and with the staff of the voluntary agencies and church organizations working in Honduras. Field visits were conducted to the Salvadoran refugee camp in the northwest at Mesa Grande, to the south in Danli where Nicaraguan Ladino refugees have fled, and to the Miskito Indian refugees in Mocoran near the east coast.

A brief stop was made in Guatemala City where meetings were arranged with U.S. Embassy officials, including Ambassador Frederic Chapin, senior members of the Guatemalan government and military, and with voluntary agency personnel working in the field.

The following preliminary report represents our joint findings and recommendations.

TABLE I.—SUMMARY OF REFUGEES/DISPLACED PERSONS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

[September 1983]

Location	Refugees	Displaced persons

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONS

Central America today confronts a human dilemma. Throughout the region there is a tide of people on the move—with over three quarters of a million men, women and children either displaced from their lands and homes, or fleeing across borders from the violence, conflict, and economic adversity in their homeland. In El Salvador alone, well over 10 percent of its population are displaced or have fled.[1]

The numerous humanitarian issues confronting the region—refugee and displaced persons, political violence, hunger and medical problems—must be dealt with more adequately or they will not only complicate, but perhaps undermine, efforts to achieve peace and stability in the region.

Among the humanitarian issues needing attention are the following:

1. Strengthening international protection and assistance to refugees and displaced persons.—If the needs of refugees and displaced persons throughout the region are to be adequately met, there must be an effort to bolster and expand the work of the several international and voluntary agencies already involved in the area, and to encourage others to join in the effort. Of particular importance is the work of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). In Honduras, the UNHCR is performing an outstanding role as coordinator for international assistance to refugees, and fulfilling its mandate to provide refugee protection. However, in El Salvador no such international umbrella exists for an even more serious displaced person problem. It is urgently needed.

The United States should lend strong diplomatic support to the creation of an international coordinating agency in El Salvador too stimulate and channel additional assistance to an estimated half million internal refugees who are in need of help. As outlined in this report, there are currently three different agencies and channels for providing assistance to displaced persons in El Salvador, and too little coordination or mutual support exists between them. Both to coordinate humanitarian assistance, as well as to assure that needs are equally met among the various groups now being assisted—and to depoliticize the use of such aid—the U.S. should support efforts to designate either the ICRC, the U.N. World Food Program (WFP) or, the good offices of the UNHCR, as the international coordinating agency for humanitarian assistance in El Salvador.

The ICRC already has a substantial presence and record of accomplishment in El Salvador and could easily expand its operation and staff to provide needed coordination, if the government of El Salvador requests it and if the United States is willing to support its expansion. Similarly, the WFP is moving to establish a more permanent program to meet what clearly will be on-going food needs among displaced persons. Since the provision of food—and the food-for-work programs for the displaced—is by far the largest component of the relief program, WFP, is empowered to assume a coordinating role if asked.

However, the role of international coordinator would even more appropriately and effectively be played by the UNHCR—which already has a substantial presence in the region and whose work with Salvadorans in Honduras and elsewhere is directly tied to the developments inside El Salvador. The U.S. should explore with the Salvadoran government the possibility of asking UNHCR to exercise its "good offices" function to assume the role of international coordinator of humanitarian assistance for displaced persons in El Salvador. There is ample precedence of such action and, given conditions today in El Salvador, justification to move forward on it.

2. Increased humanitarian assistance to El Salvador.—For nearly a year, the growing number of displaced persons in El Salvador was not addressed by the United States or the government of El Salvador. The first effort to assess their numbers and needs was not launched until January, 1982, when there were already between 165,000 and 200,000 displaced persons throughout the country. Most of them had moved in with friends or family members or were living in shantytowns around urban centers. About 5 percent of the displaced persons were considered at the time to be living in "extremely deplorable conditions." Over the following year, but particularly since the beginning of 1983, the number of displaced persons in such conditions has increased as the problem in many locations increased into large-scale refugee camp situations.

A formal government program of assistance was established, but needs persist. During the past year, the United States provided a small employment generating, food-for-work type of project, and an immunization program. However, by mid-1983 it became apparent that such efforts were inadequate to meet growing relief needs—inadequate to deal with camp-like conditions (which are still sub-standard in some areas)—or to respond to shortages of food and medicines.

In the days ahead, El Salvador can expect:

A large population of displaced persons will remain in need of help as the conflict in the countryside continues and as the economy continues to flounder;

Tens of thousands of displaced persons, mostly women and children, will remain dependent upon regular distributions of food and medicines, some in short supply and both subject to maldistribution;

Pockets of serious malnutrition and disease will persist among civilians in rural areas and contested zones cut-off by the fighting;

Human rights violations will persist in many areas of the country as the violence from the left and the right continues;

The nation's economy, and its support of the health, education and welfare programs (such as they exist) will continue to decline.

In short, the humanitarian problems confronting the people of El Salvador will remain. The United States should consider doubling its 1984 contributions to direct relief programs in El Salvador from the modest $10.5 million spent this year. A.I.D. should be authorized to use additional Economic Support Funds (ESF) and other appropriate program funds to support public health projects and employment generation programs for displaced persons.

There must be a commitment to improving the conditions of the displaced persons as part of the overall strategy for economic recovery in El Salvador. While some military assistance is obviously necessary, a complementary program of humanitarian aid is also needed to help El Salvador provide basic assistance and protection to its citizens displaced by the conflict and violence.

3. Continued support for refugees in Honduras.—After a difficult beginning, the UNHCR has established an effective program to assist and protect a growing number of Salvadoran, Guatemalan and Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras. Although some problems remain in assuring protection for Salvadoran refugees, the dark days of the La Virtud situation are behind us and an effective working relationship has been established between officers of the UNHCR and the Honduran civilian and military authorities.

Camp conditions in Mesa Grande, where some 10,000 Salvadorans are settled, are good by international standards. Although there is not enough land to allow them to become self-sufficient, even if the Honduran government permitted them to farm it (which they do not, except under strict controls), the camp is nonetheless relatively spacious, the programs of support adequate, and education, handicraft and other programs being undertaken by the voluntary agencies are imaginative. In fact, in the near term, proposals to close or transfer substantial portions of this camp should be discouraged. The refugees do not want to move at this time, and such a move—even with self-sufficiency as its goal—would be a questionable use of scarce international resources, given the good conditions achieved at Mesa Grande at some considerable cost and effort. This is particularly the case if the companion Salvadoran camp at Colomoncagua is moved from the border for security reasons, or if the refugee flow from Nicaragua increases.

In general, refugee conditions in Honduras are stable, and the attitude of the government in accepting its status as a country of first asylum should be commended. Even if the numbers of new arrivals were to increase in the future, an excellent infrastructure of personnel and programs has been established under UNHCR auspices and it should be able to handle such an influx easily.

The longer-term problem of reaching a durable solution for the refugees in Honduras, especially for the Salvadorans who cannot stay forever, remains problematic. In the meantime, however, the program of assistance and protection is more than satisfactory and it deserves the strong support of the United States.

4. Extended Voluntary Departure for Salvadorans in the United States.—It is estimated today that there are up to 500,000 Salvadorans in the United States in illegal immigration status. Some United States groups have called for extended voluntary departure status for these people until the conflict in El Salvador subsides. However, this status has not been granted, the rationale being that there is no evidence of persecution of those who are sent back, that there are other countries of first asylum available, and that most Salvadorans here in the United States are economic migrants without valid claims to persecution in El Salvador.

Extensive efforts have been made by many private and religious groups to determine the fate of Salvadorans returning from the United States, and no evidence has been found to document that they are harmed.

There are areas of the country, particularly in the city of San Salvador and in the western provinces, where the conflict and violence is minimal. There are displaced person camps throughout the country where food and medical assistance is available and international personnel are present. And the Honduran government has indicated its willingness to accept all refugees who enter Honduras from El Salvador.

The 300 to 350 Salvadorans who are currently being returned by the United States to El Salvador each month [2] are subject to the same violence every resident of that country faces, but there is clear evidence that there is no governmentally sanctioned program to target or harass returning Salvadorans simply because they have been in the United States.

However, no official agency has conducted a follow-up study on individual Salvadorans returned by the United States. Private, nongovernmental groups cannot, without great difficulty, undertake such an assessment on their own, without the cooperation of the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service and the United States Embassy.

This lack of documentation has resulted in broad support for a field study to determine, to the extent possible given conditions in El Salvador, the fate of these Salvadorans who are deported or who are returning voluntarily after being apprehended by the Immigration and Naturalization Service. This study should be sponsored by the United States.

Such a study could be done on a random sample basis over a period of several months, and implemented by the U.S. Embassy or a voluntary agency with the cooperation of the U.S. Embassy. The ICRC, the Salvadoran government's Commission on Human Rights, and the Tutela Legal, the human rights monitoring office associated with the Archdiocese of El Salvador, appear willing to acept this important role. Our government should pursue this issue without delay.

Until the results of this study are available, the INS should develop guidelines, such as are used in other areas of the world, which would identify certain categories of Salvadorans who are more likely subject to political violence. There is evidence that teachers and medical personnel face additional risk.

SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS

El Salvador

1. Priorities of humanitarian assistance.—In addition to the continued provision of basic food and medical supplies to displaced persons, our assistance program should now give higher priority to: (1. up-grading conditions in the camps (overcrowding, drainage, etc.); (2. the expansion of employment generation programs and targeting them to benefit the health and welfare of the displaced persons as well as the local community; and (3. the establishment of handicraft and other training programs for women who are idle in the camps.

2. Resolving the plight of displaced persons in church compounds.—Some 4,000 displaced persons—almost wholly women and children—are crowded into the small compounds of the Basilica and churches of the Archdiocese of El Salvador. Some have been there for as long as two to three years—some have even been born there—under conditions that severely limit their freedom. These families have sought the protection of the church because they fear that they will not be assisted or protected under the government's displaced person program. In the eyes of some Salvadoran military and government officials many of these people are seen as "subversives." Even if they are the dependent families of guerrillas or political opponents, they must receive adequate humanitarian assistance.

Every effort should be made to secure the safe removal of these people—to have them settled elsewhere in El Salvador under the care and protection of a responsible international agency, such as the ICRC or UNHCR. The U.S. Embassy should lend our strong diplomatic support to the resolution of this humanitarian issue, which remains a burden to the church and an unnecessary confinement of the persons involved. It should be in the interests of all concerned—the government, the church, and outside humanitarian organizations—to resolve this problem as soon as possible.

3. Support for human rights organizations.—We should actively support the work of the two principal human rights organizations in El Salvador, the Tutela Legal, which is associated with the Archdiocese, and the newly established Commission on Human Rights. The Tutela Legal has an established record. However, the new Commission on Human Rights, operating out of the President's office, does not yet have a permanent mandate. We should support efforts to codify the work of this Commission in the new Constitution and to assure its future operation and independence.

4. Diplomatic support for the International Committee of the Red Cross.—Two years ago the obstruction that the ICRC faced in obtaining access to prisoners was so great it nearly decided to close its offices and end the pretense that it was able to fulfill its obligations under the Geneva Conventions. However, diplomatic intervention avoided that unfortunate development.

The ICRC now reports improvement in their ability to provide humanitarian assistance to displace persons in El Salvador. It also has access to political and military prisoners held by the Salvadoran authorities. However, it continues to face obstacles in obtaining responses from the government upon many of its recommendations.

The ICRC still needs strong diplomatic support to overcome the persistent resistance it encounters at many levels in El Salvador concerning its work with political and military prisoners and its assistance to civilians in contested zones. Currently in Morazan provence the local commander is blocking the transportation of food and medicines to the northern portions of the province, declaring that the intensity of the conflict is too great. If this intervention is of only a short duration, during military operations, ICRC representatives can understand. However, if it extends much longer, it will interfere with ICRC's distribution of relief supplies to non-combatants.

5. Amnesty program.—For a period of three months this summer, El Salvador launched an amnesty program under which some 1,000 came forward—half of whom were political prisoners released from prisons. The program was hindered, however, by its short duration and the lack of any international participation to guarantee protection. We should encourage further amnesty programs under ICRC auspices, and we should join others in the international community in offering third country safe-haven or resettlement opportunities for those seeking it. For example, of the 500 political prisoners released, 200 felt endangered being out of prison without international protection and they sought third country resettlement. Canada, Belgium and Australia agreed to give many safehaven. The United States should participate in resettling those remaining as we have participated in the past in international efforts to resettle political prisoners.

6. Judiciary reform.—There is a serious need for judiciary reform in El Salvador, and we should continue to support current programs to strengthen their criminal laws and judicial system—all of which affect efforts to correct human rights abuses. Under El Salvador's laws, particularly the rules of evidence, it is sometimes difficult to prosecute offenders—especially if the charges have political overtones. In addition, many judges are not respected or adequately protected; not surprisingly, when difficult, controversial or dangerous cases come up, many find easier ways out. A serious effort to achieve judicial reform is now underway and it deserves strong support.

Honduras

1. Support of the refugee program.—As noted earlier, refugee conditions in Honduras have stabilized and an effective international program of assistance and protection has been established under UNHCR auspices. The United States must be prepared to continue our support of this program until durable solutions are achieved for the refugees. And given the relative hospitality of the Government of Honduras towards refugees and its readiness to absorb refugees on a first asylum basis, the international community needs to offer its continued assurance of diplomatic and financial support.

In the case of the Salvadorans, a durable solution appears distant. The current situation of displaced persons inside El Salvador will not persuade Salvadorans living in far better camps and conditions outside their country to soon return. A more secure countryside, relatively free of conflict, appears to be a precondition to the return of any significant number of those Salvadorans who fled the violence.

As for the Nicaraguan Miskito Indians, they are well on their way to self-sufficiency and possible integration with the Honduran Miskitos. We should support the current care and maintenance programs of the UNHCR as well as assist in mobilizing resources to establish permanent settlements for the Miskitos in Honduras—if they choose to remain. The U.S. Mission and A.I.D. should become more involved in longer term development planning and support.

A third refugee program now emerging—Ladino refugees from Nicaragua—will likely require particular attention in the days ahead, both in terms of preparations for a potential influx of refugees, and in assuring that relief assistance is used only for humanitarian purposes.

2. Protection of Salvadoran refugees.—The United States should continue to express to Honduran authorities our strong support for the UNHCR's efforts to provide protection to Salvadoran refugees. This involves not only support of the UNHCR's presence in the camps, but also at the borders.

Particular attention should be paid to protecting refugees at Colomoncagua; if it is necessary to move this camp for security reasons, better planning and support will be necessary to avoid the problems of the earlier move of Salvadorans from the La Virtud camp to Mesa Grande. Also, if the Salvadoran refugees at Colomoncagua must be relocated from the border, the UNHCR's concerns over freedom of movement should be dealt with.

3. Support UNHCR seminars for Honduran military.—We should continue our support of the special seminars that UNHCR has conducted with the Honduran army on the Refugee Convention's guidelines on the treatment of refugees. There is every indication that they have had some positive effect on the ability of UNHCR to protect refugees in Honduras, especially towards arriving Salvadoran and Guatemalan refugees—as evidenced in what could have become a dangerous incident at the El Tesoro refugee camp for Guatemalans. When the military arrested 18 camp residents, the Honduran army attempted to adhere to the UNHCR guidelines and sought the involvment of UNHCR officials.

Guatemala

1. Survey of needs of displaced persons.—Although it appears that a significant displaced persons problem is developing inside Guatemala, with all its attendant food, health, and medical problems, no one—neither the Guatemalan government, the U.S. Embassy, nor the voluntary agencies—has a grasp of the dimension of the problem. Estimates of the total number of displaced persons range from 10,000 to one million.

The United States should press for a thorough survey of displaced persons—their needs, their whereabouts and their numbers—to be conducted either by the Embassy, a voluntary agency or the government. And we should be prepared to increase substantially our humanitarian assistance program, and to support the work of the voluntary agencies—with P.L. 480 food, with emergency medical supplies, and other relief commodities. If emergency relief is necessary—and some voluntary agency field reports indicate it will be—the American Ambassador should consider taking the necessary steps to activate immediate relief funds through A.I.D.'s Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance (which was one of the first sources of funding for the displaced persons' program in El Salvador).

If a serious displaced persons problem does develop, American humanitarian assistance should be channeled through an international or voluntary agency serving as coordinator of the displaced persons program.

2. Guatemalan refugees in Mexico.—There are currently an estimated 41,000 Guatemalan refugees in the southern Mexican province of Chiapas—primarily Indians from the Ixil-triangle who have fled military campaigns in the countryside in 1981-82. Although the situation in the field has stabilized, conditions remain precarious in some areas with only a two-week food supply and serious health problems. In jungle terrain, logistics also continue to be a problem.

Despite a recent commitment by the Mexican government to offer extended assistance and protection to the refugees, and permission for the UNHCR to establish a permanent presence in the field, a longer-term solution is far off. Few, if any, refugees have been willing to accept the Guatemalan government's offer of amnesty and return to their country. There is a general lack of confidence in the protection they will receive when they return. A carefully negotiated repatriation program under UNHCR auspices, with strong diplomatic and financial support of the United States, might help resolve the problem. A good beginning will be an invitation to refugee leaders to return home—again, under UNHCR protection—to see conditions for themselves.

But it is unlikely they will be persuaded to return if they see displaced persons among their fellow countrymen receiving less assistance or protection than is being received under UNHCR programs in Mexico.●

PRESS CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY THE DISABILITY RIGHTS EDUCATION AND DEFENSE FUND

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday, I had the pleasure of participating in a presss conference with the world-famous violinist, Itzhak Perlman, to kick off the disability public awareness Foundation project, which will be administered by the disability rights education and defense fund. The purpose of this project is to increase public awareness of the grassroots disability rights and independent living movement and the related organizations created by disabled people who work within the movement. In addition, the project is intended to develop initial financial support for a foundation that will continue public awareness activities and provide support to various organizations run by and for disabled people, which have as their goals promoting leadership development, self-determination, and the integration of disabled people into the social, educational, and economic mainstream.

This public awareness project includes a benefit concert to be held at the Kennedy Center on October 1, 1984, featuring Mr. Perlman. In addition, there will be a 1-hour PBS Special concerning disabled people, which will be hosted by Mr. Perlman.

Unfortunately the true purpose of the press conference Monday was overshadowed by the intense media interest in the ongoing saga of Interior Secretary James Watt. As a result, Mr. Perlman and I were questioned almost exclusively on Secretary Watt's recent comments, and his potential fate as a Cabinet member. Therefore, it is important that we not lose sight of the goals of our announced campaign. This project is a matter of great significance to the very real interests of 36 million disabled Americans.

We must continue to do all that is possible to raise public awareness about the handicapped and to promote the noble goals of the disability rights education and defense fund. I urge my colleagues to join in this effort.●

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is there further business to come before the Senate?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished deputy leader for his characteristic courtesy.

I have nothing on this side.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there is an order for the convening time at 9:30 a.m. in the morning, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 5:55 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, September 28, 1983, at 9:30 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate September 27, 1983:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Nicholas A. Veliotes, of California, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Career Minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Arab Republic of Egypt.

IN THE AIR FORCE

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be reassigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be general

Gen. Jerome F. O'Malley, 171-24-0533FR, U.S. Air Force.

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be general

Lt. Gen. Lawrence A. Skantze, xxx-xx-xx... FR, U.S. Air Force.

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be reassigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be lieutenant general

Lt. Gen. Robert D. Russ, xxx-xx-xxxx FR, U.S. Air Force.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate September 27, 1983:

DEPARTMENT OF HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

Philip Abrams, of Massachusetts, to be Under Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

The above nomination was approved subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, September 27, 1983

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Frederick F. Missel, Interfaith Caregivers, Inc., Moorestown, N.J., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Father, Lord of the Nations and our Lord, we praise and thank You for this day and for Your presence with us. We know that apart from You we can do nothing, and there is so much that needs doing. Thank You that You have put us in places of power that the hungry may be fed, the naked clothed, the sick healed, and the ignorant given knowledge and light. Thank You that You have given us power to right wrongs and to lead the Nation and the world in the ways of peace. We would believe in the power of love, that the meek are truly blessed, and that good one day will carry the victory over evil. So we thank You for people of integrity, for young men and women who see visions, and old men and women who dream dreams. Let none be discouraged, but let us be true to that high calling to make all people one family united in love for each other and for You. We ask it for Your own namesake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 869. An act to amend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945.

THE REVEREND FREDERICK F. MISSEL

(Mr. FORSYTHE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure and privilege to have with us today the Reverend Frederick F. Missel from my hometown of Moorestown, N.J.

Reverend Missel has been an important, respected, and well-loved member of the community for almost 20 years during his service as associate pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Moorestown. Before coming to Moorestown, Reverend Missel was the founding pastor of St. Andrews Presbyterian Church in Berea, Ohio. Prior to that, he served as assistant pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Springfield, Ill.

Reverend Missel, a graduate of Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., earned his master of divinity at Union Theological Seminary, his master of arts from Temple University, and his doctor of ministry from Drew University.

Dr. Missel's ministry has especially focused upon the needs of some of the most vulnerable members of our society—the sick and the aging. Through counseling, pastoral care, and visitation to homes, hospitals, and nursing homes, Reverend Missel has brought a message of comfort, hope, and caring. As a part of his work to alleviate pain and loneliness, Reverend Missel was responsible for organizing a volunteer chaplaincy program at the Burlington County Memorial Hospital, drawing together the services of 70 different ministers, priests, and rabbis from neighboring towns to make daily visits to patients.

Most recently, his concerns for the sick and the aging have led Reverend Missel to take on the executive directorship of Interfaith Caregivers, a nonprofit organization formed by eight Moorestown churches to respond to the social and health needs of the frail elderly and the disabled. In this new position, Reverend Missel will be directing efforts to train community volunteers, as well as family and neighbors, in caring for the frail elderly and in coordinating the services available from secular agencies with the support which local parishes can provide.

In addition to his pastoral responsibilities in his own church, including preaching and teaching, Reverend Missel has helped organize new churches and special ministries to the poor and to Spanish-speaking residents of South Jersey.

Reverend Missel also has a wonderful family: His wife, Esther; his son, Frederick; and his two daughters, Deborah Sweeney and Gillian Colyer.

I want to extend my thanks to Chaplain Ford for inviting Reverend Missel to offer today's prayer and to Reverend Missel for helping us remember the true context in which our work here will be judged.

THE REAGAN DEFICITS—LARGEST IN POSTWAR HISTORY

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, the times we live in are not very happy times. Global conflict, much of which we are directly involved in, spans the Earth. The world economy is anything but stable. And, to make matters worse, weather patterns are not what they should be in nations across the face of this planet. Floods and droughts, hurricanes and extreme temperatures occur where they are least expected. All of these conditions make the general world condition one of chronic instability and widespread hardship. As I said, Mr. Speaker, these are not easy times for any of us.

Mr. Speaker, when times are not easy, it becomes even more important for us to control the things we can control. We cannot control the behavior of the peoples living in the Mideast, just as the actions and reactions of our South American neighbors are well beyond our purview. We cannot control the drought in the Midwest anymore than we can prevent hurricanes from ripping apart the State of Texas. What we can control, however, is the amount of money we spend. This administration can, if it chooses, control the size of our Nation's deficit.

It is becoming increasingly obvious that controlling our Nation's deficit is not a matter of high priority with this administration.

The facts are appalling. The smallest anticipated Reagan deficit is nearly twice as large as the biggest deficit ever run up by the Carter administration. The fact is that Mr. Reagan's deficits—whether measured in actual dollars, dollars adjusted for inflation, or as a percentage of the GNP—are by far the largest deficits in postwar history. According to projections made by the Congressional Budget Office, the average Reagan deficit over 4 years will be approximately $179 billion. In 1986, according to CBO projections, our Nation's level of debt will reach a whopping $2.1 trillion—nearly doubling under the Reagan administration.

Mr. Speaker, we can control our deficits, if we choose to. I, for one, am growing weary of hearing the same, old tired rhetoric of this administration. I urge my colleagues and the American people to stop being fooled by the President's hollow words; I urge my colleagues and the American people to simply take a good, hard look at the facts: Under the Reagan administration, we are living in the widest, harshest sea of red ink ever. It is time this administration did something about it.

I insert material concerning the budget deficits since World War II in the RECORD at this point.

BUDGET DEFICITS SINCE WORLD WAR II

President	Average deficits per administration [1]	Cumulative budget deficits as a percentage of GNP
Truman (surplus)	+$6	+0.8
Eisenhower	6	.4
Kennedy	16	1.0

A WHOPPING $202 BILLION DEFICIT

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, when Harry Truman became President in 1945, well over half the number of Americans living today were not born yet. That was 35 years ago, and the Nation has had eight Presidents since then—Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, Carter, and now Reagan.

During the combined tenure of these seven Presidents their average annual deficits totaled together, add up to the whopping figure of $202 billion. That is seven Presidents added together, remember and the figure would be larger except that President Truman averaged an annual surplus of $6 billion.

Still, $202 billion—the accumulated annual average for all those years—is a huge sum. Now reflect on the fact that President Reagan's projected deficit for the current fiscal year is even larger—$207 billion, an almost unbelievably enormous figure.

Mr. Speaker, no wonder that so many Americans of all political persuasions, from Main Street to Wall Street, are alarmed at this overwhelming tide of Reagan red ink. We cannot swim in it, we cannot drink it, and Mr. Reagan sure cannot wash it off.

PRESIDENT REAGAN AND THE FEDERAL DEFICIT

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it took us 192 years, since the first Congress convened in 1789, to amass a national debt of $1 trillion. Under President Reagan's policies, the national debt will hit $2 trillion by 1986. The President will double the national debt in less than 6 years. President Reagan has presided over the most dramatic surge in deficits in the history of the United States. Ronald Reagan has gone from a Presidential candidate who warned us of the dangers of deficit spending and who promised us a balanced budget to a President who has accumulated more in deficits than all the administrations since George Washington combined.

Who has benefited from the President's policy of "spend and spend—borrow and borrow?" Certainly not poor or moderate income groups. The so-called across-the-board tax cuts the President gave us in 1981 were across the board in name only. These tax cuts benefited only the wealthiest taxpayers providing little or no relief to most Americans. Yet, it was these tax cuts combined with a massive increase in defense spending that gave us recordbreaking Federal deficits and the most severe economic recession since the Great Depression.

We must reverse the President's skewed sense of priorities and reduce the Federal deficit. We must not idly stand by and listen to a President who supports a constitutional amendment to forbid his successors from running up deficits, while he does nothing to control the deficit monster now. We must enact a compassionate and sensible economic program that provides necessary funding for programs that help our less fortunate, strengthens our defense in a reasonable and balanced manner, and restores some semblance of equity to our tax system. If we fail to act, we may all drown in a sea of red ink.

MR. WATT SHOULD STOP POLARIZING THE NATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The gentlewoman from Colorado.

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is terribly important to point out that a lot of the controversy around Secretary James Watt was purposely created by him. He is not an innocent. In October 1981, there was a meeting of State Republican Chairs in the West, and it was reported in many newspapers that Secretary Watt bragged that he relished the controversy surrounding him and his statements because controversy he created only made money flow into Republican coffers faster. Such a statement is shocking and it shows that a lot of what Secretary Watt has been doing is purposeful and calculated to make money come into the Republican National Committee. If Secretary Watt's insults are part of the Republican National Committee's policy to help it raise money, then it is only fair that they share some of that money with the many groups that Mr. Watt has been attacking in order to make the money flow.

Enough. It is time to stop Secretary Watt's fundraising attacks on different groups. We should stop him from trying to polarize this Nation, and work instead to bring it together.

MORATORIUM NEEDED ON OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS DRILLING

(Mr. LEVINE of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to emphasize the importance of including a moratorium on Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas leasing in the Santa Monica Bay in the Interior appropriations conference report later this week. Separate and apart from Secretary Watt's outrageous statements, his policies and plans to drill for oil in the Santa Monica Bay would have a devastating and irreparable impact on the economy as well as the environment of that region.

Southern California's beaches are the most heavily used beaches in the country. Economic damage from the loss of tourism, beach use, tax revenues, fishing revenue, property values and pleasure boat revenue amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars would be suffered as a result of drilling in the bay and would be further compounded if an oil spill were to occur. A potential spill as a result of drilling could damage the environment by harming the beaches and wildlife and by increasing southern California's air pollution. Southern California suffers from some of the worst smog episodes in the country. The increased air pollution would create real and dangerous additional health hazards.

The moratorium that has been proposed should be enacted in conference to protect this precious natural resource before further drilling takes place.

FADI MITRI, A GREAT PHOTOGRAPHER RISKS HIS LIFE FOR LEBANON PHOTOGRAPHS

(Mr. RAHALL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, on September 15 and 16 a photo exhibit was on display in the rotunda of the Russell Senate Office Building which I hope that many of my colleagues had the opportunity to view. The exhibit was titled "Battleground Lebanon: A Photographer's View of the 1982 War" and was sponsored by the National Association of Arab Americans. The photographs were taken by Fadi Mitri, a journalist in Beirut at the time of the war of last summer.

The photo exhibit is a vivid reminder of the destruction and human suffering inflicted on Lebanon last summer. Mr. Mitri's photographs bring us closer to realizing what the Lebanese and Palestinians have been subjected to. It is especially relevant today because our marines are assuming a larger role in Lebanon. The exhibit has given Members of Congress a better perspective of what our Marines and the people of Lebanon are facing today.

I would like to compliment Mr. Mitri for the superb photographs which he has provided for which he risked his life to shoot and I hope that he will continue to share his work with us in the future.

LET'S REMOVE THE IMF DEADLOCK

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today the President will address the International Monetary Fund and he will state to them that while he has been doing everything he can to see that the U.S. commitment to appropriate $8.4 billion is fulfilled that the Congress is deadlocked and the Congress ought to act.

Well, Mr. President, if you really want to see Congress pass the IMF bill then I would urge you to do several things.

First, I would urge you to get your party to stop attacking Democrats who voted for the bill because you are losing support every minute because of that event. I would urge you to get many members of your party to vote for the bill. In our House it was the Democratic side that carried the legislation. And, finally, Mr. President, I would urge you to look at some of the amendments that have been passed which make things easier on the world economy and the beleaguered Third World countries such as Brazil and do not allow the banks to make record profits on these terrible loans. Until you do those things, Mr. President, the Congress will remain deadlocked.

CHUN BYUNG IN, PILOT OF KAL FLIGHT 007

(Mr. BLILEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to eulogize Chun Byung In, the 45-year-old pilot of KAL flight 007. Father of a 10-year-old son and a 13-year-old daughter, Mr. Chun had been with KAL since 1972. During that time he was described as a model pilot and received a citation last year for his accident free record. He left his family on August 27 with a simple see you soon, as he went on his way to what he expected to be a routine flight. But it was not a routine flight. Mr. Chun's life was taken as well as the 268 passengers that accompanied him when their flight strayed into the hands of the Soviets.

Mr. Speaker, we realize of course, that there is nothing we or the Soviets can do to bring back the lives of the KAL 007 flight victims. However, we can, we must and we will ask the Soviets to give new life and freedom to others as a reparation for this heinous crime against humanity. Specifically we call upon the Soviet Union, in reparation for the life of Chun Byung In, to release another man of conscience; a champion of freedom and justice, Ints Calitis.

This Latvian freedom fighter has devoted his life to the people of the Baltic Republics. His activities have kept him in and out of concentration camps from 1947 to 1964. He was a signer of the "Memorandum from 45 Balts" against the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact that led to the occupation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. Most recently, he was arrested in 1983 for having contact with the West and possessing Western publications. He is presumed to be currently held in the KGB headquarters and prison, and is due to be sentenced this month.

AMERICA'S CUP

(Mr. MOLINARI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, heartiest congratulations are in order for the victorious Australians in this year's America's cup.

The competition this year was intense, with contenders from Australia, Great Britain, France, Canada, and Italy. In the seventh and final race, Australia II, with John Bertrand at the helm, overcame a substantial lead held by the U.S. yacht Liberty, under the leadership of Dennis Conner, and captured the cup.

I was fortunate to meet Dennis Conner and John Bertrand this past weekend. The extent of the interest generated worldwide by this contest was phenomenal. This has to go down in history as one of the greatest sporting events of all times and certainly the skipper, the sponsors, the crew of the Australia II and, for that matter all Australians, have a right to be proud of their great achievement.

I ask my colleagues in Congress to join me in the true American spirit of good sportsmanship in extending heartfelt congratulations to our Australian friends. As Americans, I know that we can be proud of winning the cup back in 1851 and holding the title in 24 successful defenses since then. Now, it is Australia's turn and they certainly deserve the honor.

CONGRESSIONAL PROGRAMS TO HELP FARMERS

(Mr. HARKIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, America's farmers have proven time and again they have the productive capacity to produce abundant supplies of food and fiber for both domestic and exports markets. Yet with this summer's drought and record heat, we have been reminded, once again that agriculture remains a risky business subject to natural forces which stretch far beyond the farmer's control.

I believe one of the functions of government is to maintain a reserve available to families whose livelihood have been disrupted by natural disasters whether from hurricane, tornadoes, floods, or droughts. Now we have been told that there is no reserve available and that enough is enough and we can do no more.

Obviously some farmers are in a position to absorb the losses of just 1 bad year. However there are cow-calf producers in southern Iowa who were in trouble before this year's drought. This year started with an unusually cold, wet spring in which many producers lost 30 percent or more of their new born calves. In addition they have had poor crops harvests the past several years along with low livestock prices and throughout it all they have had to pay double digit interest rates.

These producers now face a difficult choice. Many will be forced to liquidate their mother herds in order to pay their bills. Once their cows have gone to slaughter, their only other option will be to convert their pasture land into intensive row crop production and try to survive raising corn on soils best suited for grazing cattle. In the long run, the American consumer will pay, not only for higher meat prices but for higher soil conservation costs as well.

This need not happen. The Congress has provided the authority to implement livestock feed programs which are designed to assist the family farmer maintain his herd until new feed supplies become available in the next growing season. I intend to conduct a hearing in my Subcommittee on Livestock, Dairy, and Poultry to further explore these existing programs.

We need to move forward quickly and in a way which will insure that our investment in this emergency assistance does in fact aid those whose very survival as family farmers depends upon having these supplemental feed programs implemented as soon as possible.

RENEWAL OF U.S. AGREEMENT FOR A BASE IN THE PHILIPPINES

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, whether our country renews a base agreement with the Marcos regime in the Philippines ought to be strictly a commercial decision. At the same time, we should make very clear to President Marcos that our country reserves complete freedom to cut our aid levels and take whatever other steps we deem appropriate to protest the repressive human rights policies of the Marcos regime and to encourage a return to democratic government in the Philippines. It is an affront to the American and the Filipino people that President Marcos would attempt to use the negotiations over a new base agreement to blackmail President Reagan into visiting the Philippines in November.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAHALL). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule IX.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken today after debate has been concluded on both suspensions.

INTERNATIONAL COFFEE AGREEMENT ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3813) to amend the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1980.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3813

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1980 (19 U.S.C. 1356k et seq.) is amended—

(1) by amending section 2 by striking out "for such period prior to October 1, 1983 as the agreement remains in effect," and inserting in lieu thereof "before October 1, 1985,"; and

(2) by amending each of sections 2, 3, and 5 by striking out "1976" and inserting in lieu thereof "1983".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI).

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3813 grants until 1985 authority for the President to implement the terms of the International Coffee Agreement of 1983, a multilateral agreement between the major coffee exporting and importing countries recently ratified by the Senate. H.R. 3813 would extend the same authority granted by Congress in 1980 to implement the earlier 1976 International Coffee Agreement. The bill permits the President to regulate the importation of coffee in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The agreement provides for export quotas and buffer stocks by exporting countries, which are then enforced by importing countries through regulations of the type permitted in H.R. 3813. These stocks are released when prices get too high, thus maintaining stable prices in a range acceptable to all members. The bill also contains many measures to protect the interests of U.S. consumers and to prevent unwarranted price increases by exporting nations.

This legislation is strongly supported by the administration and by the vast majority of the U.S. coffee industry, including importers, roasters, and distributors.

The Committee on Ways and Means has maintained strict oversight of this legislation, and is satisfied that adequate consumer safeguards exist. We will have an opportunity to review the effects of the legislation and the agreement in 1985, when this bill expires. At that point, we will be able to decide whether renewal of the implementing authority for the remaining 4 years of the agreement is warranted.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS), the subcommittee chairman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 3813, a bill providing authority to the President to implement the International Coffee Agreement signed by the United States on March 23, 1983, and recently ratified by the Senate. The new agreement is set to go into effect on October 1, 1983, replacing the document that has governed world coffee trade for the past 7 years.

The objective of the International Coffee Agreement is to stabilize the price of coffee within a range that is negotiated annually by both consumer and producer signatories. This goal is achieved, as was the case under the 1976 Coffee Agreement, through country export quotas, stockpiling requirements and agreed price ranges. In order to maintain supply and demand equilibrium, quotas are increased and stocks released when prices are rising and quotas become more restrictive when prices are falling. Quotas are suspended altogther if prices rise to exceptionally high levels.

The United States imports about 30 percent of the coffee traded on the world market. Coffee imports amounted to $2.7 billion in 1982. Therefore, it remains important that the United States insure an adequate role for consuming nations. This agreement contains provisions that improve the participation of importing countries. Most importantly, although not directly involved in quota negotiations, consuming countries must approve the final quota distribution. Also there is greater assurance that stocks will be there when prices rise since each producing country's export quota partially depends on its level of stocks.

Concern has been raised in the past that commodity agreements, including the Coffee Agreement, have not adquately protected the consumer and, in some instances, have served as a cover for cartel activities and other unfair trade practices. In order for the Congress to more carefully monitor the effectiveness of the 1983 Coffee Agreement, intended to be in effect through 1989, this legislation grants authority to implement for only 2 years. Renewal of implement authority, will depend on whether the agreement succeeds in protecting the interests of consuming nations and insuring fair market discipline.

Mr. Speaker, the administration has strongly urged the Congress to approve this implementing bill in time to have the new agreement in place by the first of October. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting "yes" on H.R. 3813.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I am about to yield back the balance of my time, too, and hope that we can go ahead and pass this resolution.

The chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI), and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) have fully explained the purpose of the resolution.

This is not an earth-shaking piece of congressional business. The other body has already ratified the treaty that the administration has entered into. We are merely setting up the housekeeping functions here that have to be carried out because of our role in regulating trade.

I can promise you that there will be close supervision of the carrying out of this, close oversight.

□ 1230

I hope that we can get this little piece of housekeeping out of the way.

Mr. Speaker, unless there are questions, I will yield back the balance of my time and urge an affirmative vote.

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3813, the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1983, legislation which I have introduced with my colleague, Mr. FRENZEL. I want to thank both Chairman GIBBONS and Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI for their expeditious handling of this legislation. With the present agreement expiring on September 30, the prompt consideration given to this legislation was greatly appreciated. With this said, I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 3813, the International Coffee Agreement Act of 1983.

The United States has participated in International Coffee Agreements since 1962 in an effort to stabilize the wide variations in price and to balance the economic interests of producers and consumers. The basic framework of the 1983 agreement is similar to the agreement that has been in effect since 1976.

The International Coffee Agreement of 1983 was negotiated by 71 countries. The International Coffee Agreement, the ICA, is an international treaty, and as such was ratified by the United States Senate on July 27, 1983, by a vote of 100 to 0.

One of the main reasons this treaty was unanimously approved by the Senate was its acceptance by consumer organizations. These groups have no problem with an agreement that assures stability of prices and long-term supply. An American consumer adviser was present during the negotiations of the treaty, and he fully approved the final agreement.

Coffee is the most important agricultural commodity in the export trade of the developing world. Over 40 nations depend on coffee for export earnings, and 10 of these nations earned more than 25 percent of their foreign exchange from coffee exports.

The United States is the world's largest consumer of coffee, and U.S. participation in the ICA is important for the economies of the developing nations. Full U.S. involvement serves a foreign policy goal of improving relations with these developing countries.

The 71 countries participating in the ICA of 1983 are responsible for virtually all production of coffee and over 90 percent of world coffee consumption. The ICA itself contains no fixed price objective. Rather, each year the members of the International Coffee Organization establish a price range based on current production and consumption trends, inventory levels, and other factors that influence the market. This price range is not agreed upon until it is accepted by two-thirds of both the consuming and producing countries.

Finally, the International Coffee Agreement of 1983 is an improvement over the agreements of 1962, 1968, and 1976. The 1983 ICA enhances the role of the importing countries in determining individual country exports, refines the provisions regarding export shortfalls, and clarifies the language outlining the producers' obligation to refrain from market activity outside the scope of the agreement.

The bill before you today, H.R. 3813, implements U.S. participation in this treaty for a 2-year period. Similar language was adopted in 1980 by Congress, and a 1-year extension was granted by the 97th Congress in order to allow the negotiations on the new treaty to continue.

I urge my colleagues to suspend the rules and pass H.R. 3813. Thank you.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3813.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 3813, which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY EXTENSION OF HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 366), to provide for the temporary extension of certain insurance programs relating to housing and community development, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.J. RES. 366

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

EXTENSION OF FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION MORTGAGE INSURANCE PROGRAMS

(c) Section 1201(b)(1) of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out "September 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "November 30, 1983".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

The gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ).

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. Earlier this year, Congress approved a temporary extension of certain authorities of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. This was necessary because without that action, the Secretary's authority to issue FHA mortgage insurance would have ceased; also the authority to provide flood, riot and crime insurance would cease. That temporary extension of authority was enacted in the full expectation that the Congress would complete action on a regular housing authorization bill by the end of the current fiscal year. Unfortunately, although the House has approved a comprehensive housing bill in the form of H.R. 1, the other body has yet to take any action on housing programs. That being the case, we are faced once again with the expiration of vital housing and community development programs at the end of this week.

In the past year we have seen a fair—not robust—but fair recovery in the housing market. It is a recovery that is fragile, because the interest rate outlook remains uncertain. This is a critical time for the housing business, and any lapse of the FHA mortgage insurance program would be a severe blow not only to housing, but the economy generally.

One particular concern to many of my colleagues is that the section 235 assisted program authority will also expire on Saturday. This cutoff exists because the Gramm-Latta Act created a date certain beyond which the Secretary could no longer make commitments under the section 235 program. Even though there is no new 235 housing authorization, there are still units being built under previously enacted authority. My personal preference would be to strike the Gramm-Latta date certain, so that the section 235 pipeline could be closed off in an orderly way. However, the minority has reservations about striking that provision of law, and accordingly I will offer an amendment to House Joint Resolution 366 providing for a temporary extension. This temporary extension is acceptable to me, as a matter of comity, and it is also acceptable to the minority.

The resolution is offered in amended form to provide for a 60-day, rather than a 30-day, extension of the basic housing law authorities. I am doing so because I understand from the Senate that every effort is being made to move a housing bill there, and the other body requests a 60-day extender in order to allow time for the Senate to act, and hopefully a conference to be completed on H.R. 1. I recognize the good intentions and good faith efforts being made by the other body, and am happy to accommodate them by offering an amendment for a 60-day extension of housing law authority. This amendment has been cleared with the minority and is acceptable to them.

To summarize, House Joint Resolution 366 provides an essential extension of the basic insuring authorities of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development—FHA mortgage insurance, crime, riot and flood insurance, and authority to continue making final commitments under the section 235 assisted housing program. At the proper time, I will offer an amendment that makes this extension valid for 60 days. The motion I will offer has been cleared with the minority, and the resolution as amended will be, I am assured, acceptable to the Senate. There is no controversy with regard to this matter, and I urge support of the resolution.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 366, which is necessary to provide extensions of the authorities of the Secretary of HUD to insure mortgages under provisions of the National Housing Act. In addition, the resolution extends the authority of the Farmers Home Administration to continue the rural housing programs, and, finally, the resolution extends the three Federal insurance programs administered by the Federal Insurance Administration—flood insurance, crime insurance, and riot reinsurance.

Originally, this extender resolution provided for only a 30-day extension of authorities, but with an amendment called up today by the distinguished chairman of the Housing Subcommittee, Mr. GONZALEZ of Texas, the extension would be for 60 days, until November 30 of this year. We are providing for this additional time period at the request of the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee. They have told us that they need this additional time to attempt to pass the Senate housing authorization bill, S. 1338. A week ago, Mr. Speaker, I would not have agreed to this more lengthy extension, but in the past week, the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee has indicated to me that they are attempting to get the Senate housing authorization bill approved by the Senate and to conference with the House bill, H.R. 1.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of House Joint Resolution 366 with the pending amendments.●

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today Chairman GONZALEZ and I are asking the House to suspend the rules and pass House Joint Resolution 366 with an amendment. As is appropriate for considering legislation under this procedure, the resolution is supported by both sides of the aisle and is noncontroversial.

House Joint Resolution 366 as amended will extend until November 30 certain Federal insurance programs that otherwise are slated to expire on September 30. We propose a 60-day extension of these programs. This will allow those people administering the FHA mortgage insurance program and the Federal crime, riot, and flood insurance programs to operate with the knowledge that their legal authority to make new commitments will not be expiring on a week-to-week or month-to-month basis. The extension also will allow the Senate to work whatever miracles are needed to complete consideration of a housing authorization bill which would include a full year authorization for these insurance programs.

When the House passed a similar extension of these programs in May of this year, I pledged "to do all that I can to see that the Members get a housing bill to vote on before this extension expires." I met my pledge but unfortunately the other body has not been able to move as swiftly as we did. I hope that this additional time will prove fruitful and once again pledge my efforts to the production of an omnibus housing authorization bill.

In asking you to pass this resolution today I am seeking an orderly continuation of those insurance programs which are vital to our housing industry. As we have seen lately, there are encouraging signs that the housing industry may be emerging from the depths of its depression in a sustained fashion.

This, if so, will be encouraging news for all Americans. As housing goes, so goes the economy. A strong housing industry will mean jobs for millions of unemployed and the ripple effect across the Nation in small communities and small businesses will stimulate the recovery we so desperately need.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, this legislation is very important to our housing programs and is noncontroversial. It has bipartisan congressional support and the administration supports the 60-day extension of these programs. I am certain the House will agree that the rules should be suspended and House Joint Resolution 366 will be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE).

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 366, with the committee amendment, and urge its adoption. I want to simply commend the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) and the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MCKINNEY) for bringing it up today.

As has been mentioned, it would extend the FHA insurance authority beyond the expiration date of October 1, 1983. The extension is only for 2 months and I support that time limit.

In addition to the extension of the FHA programs, the resolution would also extend certain housing programs under the jurisdiction of the Farmers' Home Administration and the flood, crime, and riot insurance programs of the Federal Insurance Administration, which is part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Mr. Speaker, I support limiting this extension to 60 days because I still believe we can get a housing bill this year. I am going to continue to work toward that end, and I hope we will be successful in obtaining final passage of a housing authorization bill during this 60-day period. I also support the extension of certain authorizations—notably those dealing with crime and riot insurance—even though I am on record as opposing their permanent reauthorization. I simply do not feel this is the time or the place to wage that battle. We can consider and dispose of these issues at a later date.

I urge the House to pass House Joint Resolution 366.

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, while I intend to support House Joint Resolution 366, I do so with the greatest reluctance. My reluctance is not based on any opposition to the programs reauthorized by the legislation. Indeed, FHA, flood insurance, and Farmers Home Administration are essential programs which have served this country well for decades.

Instead, my reluctance stems from the fact that this legislation is made necessary by the absence of responsible action by the other body. Twice this session the House has passed critical housing and community development legislation. Chairman ST GERMAIN, Chairman GONZALEZ, the Banking Committee, and the House have met their responsibilities. However, there has been no similar action in the other body and no leadership demonstrated by the administration on this important issue.

I would much prefer that today we would be considering a conference report on the housing reauthorization. However, today's action demonstrates further good-faith effort which should not be misinterpreted. It does not signal any reduced commitment to produce a comprehensive housing bill, It does not signal that we are any less convinced of the critical need for a housing production program, for assistance to homeowners facing foreclosure, for a program to assist local governments to foster community development, or for a program to assist the homeless in our society. These goals remain the objectives of this Member and I am certain the objectives of this committee.

Recently there has been considerable discussion in the media that other important legislation will be delayed until action on a housing bill has been completed. While there is no attempt to directly link a housing bill with other legislation, it should be recognized by all parties that it will be hard for this committee or this Member to find any legislation which is more deserving of our time and effort than a comprehensive housing bill.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the gentlemen from Rhode Island and from Texas for the leadership they have provided on housing issues this year and to express my confidence in their ability to convince the other body and the administration of the need for swift action on a comprehensive housing bill.●

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 366, a bill which would temporarily reauthorize certain housing and community development programs.

This measure is truly a stopgap one. As amended, it would authorize for 2 months several key programs, including Federal Housing Administration mortgage insurance, section 312 rehabilitation loans, Farmers Home Administration rural housing programs, and riot reinsurance, crime and flood insurance.

It is unfortunate that we must legislate in this manner. Without an extension of this type, however, it is unlikely that we will see passage of a comprehensive housing and community development bill for fiscal 1984.

The House has done its part. We approved by a healthy margin a housing bill which made necessary changes in existing law. The Senate, reacting, I believe, to a lack of initiative by the administration on behalf of a comprehensive bill, has failed to act on the measure.

No Member of this House needs to be reminded that we have not had a housing bill signed into law since 1980. Are we to witness an entire Presidential term without a piece of housing legislation signed by the President?

We cannot continue to give our housing and community development needs such a low priority.

Let us go ahead with the legislative process.

Let us resolve differences, if necessary, in a conference committee between the two Houses.

But most of all, Mr. President, let us have a housing bill this year.

If no such bill is forthcoming, I would submit that the blame lies not with the House, which has acted, but with the administration, whose lack of action has derailed a critical piece of domestic legislation.●

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 366, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the joint resolution, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on the motion on which further proceedings were postponed on Monday, September 26, 1983.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT TEMPORARY EXTENSION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 3962, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT K. GIBBS

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I speak today in tribute to and recognition of a longtime friend of mine, Robert K. Gibbs of Henderson, Ky., who died on August 13 at the age of 78.

Bob Gibbs, long prominent in Henderson industrial circles, was truly indispensable to his community. His personal drive and ambition were unmatched. His friends and family affectionately referred to Bob Gibbs as a one-man employment bureau for thousands of Kentuckians throughout the years. He created jobs and sustained those jobs, and his businesses prospered, even in hard times.

A pioneer in the plastics field, Gibbs founded Tri-State Plastics in Henderson, a plant with four or five employees which made toys. At the time of his death, he was chairman of the board of Gibbs Die Casting Aluminum Corp., an industrial plant with over 500 employees, manufacturing a wide variety of products for such customers as IBM and General Motors.

An unselfish, compassionate, and strong man, Bob Gibbs attributed his successes to his employees who, at his insistence, were practically all from Henderson or the immediate area. A fair man, he made sure his employees were properly trained for their jobs. He also insured they were competitively salaried. His generosity seemed to have no bounds. "No one will ever know the many things he did for and gave to others anonymously," said one longtime employee of his boss.

Indeed, Henderson lost possibly one of its biggest boosters for the city upon the death of Bob Gibbs. He was supportive of and kind to me as his Congressman on many occasions. I was proud to call him a friend.

Survivors include two sons, Gary, a Henderson attorney, and Nick, president of Gibbs Die Casting; a daughter, Susan Gibbs of Housatonic, Mass.; four grandchildren, and two sisters. I extend my sympathy to the survivors and friends of this fine individual who was truly an inspiration to those of us who knew and respected him.

COAL PIPELINE ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 309 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 1010.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 1010) to amend the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920 with respect to the movement of coal, including the movement of coal over public lands, and for other purposes, with Mr. KILDEE (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Monday, September 19, 1983, all time for general debate on the bill had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the text of H.R. 3857 is considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule in lieu of the amendments recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation now printed in the reported bill, and each section is considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the rule provides that the bill shall be considered section by section for purposes of amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would the chairman please explain the purpose of his request? I am concerned because there are a large number of amendments that have been printed with respect to this particular bill and I think that the orderly consideration of the bill might be enhanced by going in order so that Members know during the course of the afternoon or the evening, whatever the state of consideration, when amendments might likely be on the floor.

I do not understand what particular purpose is served by this request.

Mr. UDALL. If the gentleman would yield, there were some informal discussions between Members on our side of the argument and Members on the other side. Several Members expressed the idea that we ought to get on with the more important amendments which may be scattered at different places in the bill and that this simply give Members an opportunity to get their important amendments and get them up early, rather than spending the afternoon on minor amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOWARD. And also for this reason: That there are many amendments and we would not want to put any Member in a position of being busy at one time or another and come in and have his section of the bill passed and not have the opportunity to offer an amendment. Even if he asked unanimous consent, any Member may deny that.

So we think that just to protect all of the Members on this big and long bill, that is the reason for this request.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHUSTER. We were made aware a few moments ago of this request and we considered it carefully. Frankly, we think that it adds to the consideration of the bill because I know the amendments which we have drafted have been drafted in such a fashion that they can be offered throughout the bill, and we really think that the gentleman's unanimous-consent request will help in the orderly and fair consideration of the bill.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) the continuing dependence of the United States on foreign sources for petroleum and petroleum products entails grave national security risks, results in major balance-of-payment deficits, and causes increases in inflation and unemployment in the domestic economy;

(2) the United States possesses extensive coal reserves that must be produced, transported, and utilized to reduce the Nation's dependence on imported petroleum;

(3) domestic coal reserves cannot be developed and used for fuel unless adequate transportation systems and facilities exist for the efficient and economic transportation of coal to markets in interstate and foreign commerce at competitive prices across great distances;

(4) the Nation's coal transportation system should include coal pipelines that will assist the Nation to develop efficiently and use its coal resources;

(5) the construction of coal pipelines to transport domestic coal will be facilitated by granting the power of eminent domain to certain coal pipelines;

(6) the construction of coal pipelines is a beneficial public use that justifies granting the Federal power of eminent domain to those pipelines for which a finding of national interest or public convenience and necessity has been made pursuant to this Act;

(7) State water law and interstate allocations are carefully balanced and structured systems for the allocation of water;

(8) the need for coal pipelines is subservient to the national interest in the primacy of State water law and interstate allocations; and

(9) therefore, the national interest is best served by developing coal pipelines only if such development is now or hereafter permitted by those State water laws and interstate allocations, notwithstanding the otherwise impermissible burden which may thereby be imposed on interstate commerce.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to facilitate the development of coal pipelines by granting the Federal power of eminent domain to those coal pipelines that are determined to be in the national interest or required by the public convenience and necessity, except that Congress declares that the development of coal pipelines may occur only if now or hereafter permitted by State water law and interstate allocations, and hereby delegates to and ratifies the exercise of such authority by the States as further set forth herein.

STATE WATER LAW

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any amendment made by this Act or any other Federal law—

(1) neither the United States nor any other person or entity shall reserve, appropriate, use, divert, dedicate, export, or otherwise claim or exercise any right or interest in, water within any State for a coal pipeline unless such reservation, appropriation, use, diversion, dedication, export or claim takes place pursuant to the substantive and procedural law of that State;

(2) pursuant to the commerce clause in article I, section 8, of the United States Constitution, the Congress hereby expressly delegates to the States the power to establish and exercise in State law, whether now in existence or hereafter enacted, terms or conditions (including terms or conditions denying or terminating use) for the reservation, appropriation, use, export, or diversion of or other claim to, or exercise of any right in, water for a coal pipeline, notwithstanding any otherwise impermissible burden which may thereby be imposed on interstate commerce;

(3) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall impair the validity of any provision of State law, regulation, or rule of law or of any interstate compact or treaty governing the appropriation, use, export, or diversion of, or other claim of right to water;

(4) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the waters of any body of surface or ground water, whether determined by past or future interstate compacts, or by past or future legislative or judicial allocation;

(5) no State acting under the authority of this section may restrict the importation or movement through the State of water acquired in another State and within a coal pipeline;

(6) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall affect water rights of any Indian or Indian tribe; and

(7) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall preempt or otherwise affect any State or Federal law or interstate compact or treaty relating to water quality or disposal.

In the event of any conflict between the provisions of this section and any other provision of this Act or any amendment made by this Act or other Federal law, the provisions of this section shall govern.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. As used in this Act—

(1) The term "antitrust laws" includes the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 12 et seq.), the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. 1 et seq.), and the Wilson Tariff Act (15 U.S.C. 8 et seq.).

(2) The term "coal" means any of the recognized classifications of coal, including anthracite, bituminous, semibituminous, subbituminous, and lignite.

(3) The term "coal pipeline" means any pipeline system for the transportation of coal in a liquid or solid state, whether alone or mixed with other substances, from a point outside a State to a point within such State or between two points in a State through another State. A coal pipeline includes the line pipe, valves, pumping stations, coal collection lines or systems, and similar equipment or facilities used or useful in the movement of coal.

(4) The term "coal pipeline carrier" means a person transporting coal by coal pipeline or proposing to transport coal by coal pipeline.

(5) The term "Commission" means the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(6) The term "Federal lands" means lands owned by the United States other than lands which are—

(A) located on the Outer Continental Shelf (as defined by the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act),

(B) designated as wilderness,

(C) designated by statute as wilderness study areas on or before January 1, 1983,

(D) administered as part of the national park system, or units of the national park system established on or before January 1, 1983,

(E) held in trust for an Indian or Indian tribe or owned by an Indian or Indian tribe subject to a restraint against alienation imposed by the United States, or

(F) held in trust by, or under the control of, the Tennesee Valley Authority.

Nothing in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph shall be construed to affect the authority of the President under section 4(d)(4) of the Wilderness Act.

(7) The term "interstate allocation" means the allocation of water between States by interstate compact or legislative or judicial allocation.

(8) The term "private lands" means any interest in any land other than interests (A) owned by the United States or owned by any State or any political subdivision thereof; (B) held in trust by the United States for an Indian or Indian tribe or owned by an Indian or Indian tribe subject to a restraint against alienation imposed by the United States; or (C) owned by a regional or village corporation established under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act if such land was transferred to such corporation pursuant to such Act.

(9) The term "right-of-way" means any interest in land, including, but not limited to, any easement, lease, permit, or license to occupy, use, or traverse any Federal land or private land.

(10) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior.

(11) The term "small and independent coal producer" means—

(A) when used with respect to a coal pipeline for which an application for certificate is filed under section 10 of this Act, a coal producer who—

(i) produced two hundred thousand tons or less of coal during the calendar year preceding the calendar year in which such application is filed, and

(ii) is not affiliated with any other company; and

(B) when used with respect to any portion of the capacity of a coal pipeline for which an election of contract service is filed under section 10951 of title 49, United States Code, a coal producer who—

(i) produced two hundred thousand tons or less of coal during the calendar year preceding the calendar year in which such election is filed, and

(ii) is not affiliated with any other company.

For purposes of this paragraph, a coal producer shall be treated as affiliated with another company if such company controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with such coal producer. The term "control" shall have the same meaning as provided by section 10102 of title 49, United States Code.

(12) The term "State" means a State of the United States and the District of Columbia.

(13) The term "State law" includes all that body of constitutional or statutory law, judicial precedent, administrative regulation and administrative decision, whether now in existence or hereafter enacted, decided, or promulgated by a State or its properly constituted officials.

RIGHTS-OF-WAY ACROSS FEDERAL LANDS

SEC. 5. (a) Except as provided in this section and section 7 of this Act, the Secretary may grant or renew to a person who holds a certificate issued under section 10 of this Act to construct a coal pipeline or extension thereof, rights-of-way over, under, upon, or through any Federal lands necessary for construction, operation, and maintenance of such pipeline or extension. In any case in which such Federal lands are administered by the head of any other agency, department, or instrumentality of the United States, the Secretary shall first consult the head of such other agency, department, or instrumentality before granting rights-of-way over, under, upon, or through such lands. The Secretary shall enter into interagency agreements with the heads of all other agencies, departments, or instrumentalities of the United States administering Federal lands for the purpose of avoiding duplication, assigning responsibility, expediting review of applications for rights-of-way under this section, issuing joint regulations, and assuring a decision by the Secretary based upon a comprehensive review of all factors involved in any application for a right-of-way under this section. Each head of any such agency, department, or instrumentality shall administer and enforce the provisions of this Act, appropriate regulations, and the terms and conditions of rights-of-way granted by the Secretary insofar as they involve Federal lands under the administrative jurisdiction of such agency, department, or instrumentality.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to any Federal lands, any right-of-way over, under, upon, or through Federal lands for the construction, operation, maintenance, or extension of a coal pipeline for which a certificate has been issued under section 10 of this Act, shall be granted or renewed after the date of enactment of this Act only as provided in this section and sections 6 and 7 of this Act.

(c) No right-of-way may be granted under this section if such right-of-way is over, under, upon, or through—

(1) any Federal land which is part of a recreation area or unit of the national wildlife refuge system of national, State, or local significance as determined by the Federal officials having administrative jurisdiction over such area or refuge, or unless there is no feasible and prudent alternative to the acquisition of such right-of-way and reasonable planning is made to minimize harm to such area, refuge, or site resulting from construction, operation, and maintenance of the coal pipeline or extension thereof.

(2) any Federal land which is part of a historic site of national, State, or local significance as determined by the Federal officials having administrative jurisdiction over such site,

APPLICABLE REQUIREMENTS CONCERNING FEDERAL LANDS

SEC. 6. (a) A right-of-way granted or renewed by the Secretary under section 5 of this Act shall be granted or renewed in accordance with the conditions, requirements, and other provisions set forth in sections 302, 304, 305, 313, 501 (other than subsection (a) thereof), 503, 504, 505 (other than paragraph (iv) of subsection (a) thereof), 506, 508, 509 (other than subsection (b) thereof), and 510 of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (Public Law 94-579), except that in applying such conditions, requirements, or provisions to a right-of-way granted or renewed under such section, any reference to the term "public lands" shall be treated as a reference to the term "Federal lands" as defined in section 4 of this Act.

(b) Each right-of-way granted or renewed by the Secretary under section 5 of this Act shall contain such other terms and conditions as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act and to protect the public interest in the lands traversed by the right-of-way and the lands adjacent to the right-of-way.

EXISTING RIGHTS-OF-WAY AND PENDING PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 7. (a) Nothing in this section and section 5 or 6 of this Act shall affect any right-of-way for a coal pipeline over, under, upon, or through Federal lands if such right-of-way was granted before the date of the enactment of this Act, except that in any case in which a certificate has been issued with respect to such coal pipeline under section 10 of this Act, such right-of-way may be renewed, extended, or acquired only as provided in this section and sections 5 and 6 of this Act.

(b)(1) The granting and administration of any right-of-way for a coal pipeline over, under, upon, or through Federal lands pursuant to an application or other request which—

(A) was made under title V of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 or under any other authority of law, and

(B) was not finally disposed of before the date of enactment of this Act, shall be governed by such title V or other authority of law, as the case may be. The provisions of this section and sections 5 and 6 of this Act shall not affect any proceedings respecting any such application or other request.

(2) The provisions of this section and sections 5 and 6 shall not affect lawsuits commenced prior to the date of enactment of this Act.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 8. The Secretary and the Commission may each issue such regulations as may be necessary to carry out their respective functions under this Act.

EMINENT DOMAIN AUTHORITY

SEC. 9. (a)(1) Subject to the other provisions of this section, any person who holds a certificate issued under section 10 of this Act to construct a coal pipeline or extension thereof may acquire rights-of-way over, under, upon, or through private lands necessary for construction, operation, and maintenance of such pipeline or extension by exercise of the power of eminent domain. Any action or proceeding to acquire lands or interests therein by eminent domain shall be filed in the appropriate court of the State in which such lands are located.

(2) In any case in which, by reason of State law, an action referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection may not be brought in a State court, such action may be brought in the appropriate United States district court.

(3) Upon petition of any affected landowner, an action brought in a State court under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be removed to the appropriate United States district court. If such action is so removed and if State law does not provide for or permit trial by jury in any such action, the affected landowner shall have the right to a trial by jury in the removed action.

(4) Subject to paragraph (3) of this subsection, in any action under this subsection, State law shall control the issues of compensation, trial by jury, and siting alternatives, except that State law shall not control if the effect of such law would prohibit an acquisition for reasons unrelated to the acquisition or use of water rights by a coal pipeline carrier and would not allow a reasonable alternative acquisition.

(b) Nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall be construed to permit any person (including the Secretary, the Commission, any other official or employee of the United States, or any coal pipeline carrier) to acquire any right to take, use, or develop water through exercise of the power of eminent domain.

(c) Any person who brings an action pursuant to this section shall pay all reasonable attorney's fees, as determined by the court, incurred by a landowner if the amount of the final offer to purchase the land in question made to the landowner prior to the initiation of the action is not at least eighty percent of the value of the land as determined pursuant to the action; except that such attorney's fees shall only exceed $20,000 if the court makes a finding of bad faith on the part of the condemner.

(d) No person may exercise the power of eminent domain under this section to acquire any right-of-way unless such person has not been able to acquire the right-of-way by negotiation within a reasonable period of time.

(e) No right-of-way may be acquired through exercise of the power of eminent domain under this section if such right-of-way is over, under, upon, or through any land which is part of a historic site of National, State, or local significance as determined by the appropriate Federal, State, or local officials unless there is no feasible and prudent alternative to the acquisition of such right-of-way and reasonable planning is made to minimize harm to such site resulting from the construction, operation, and maintenance of the coal pipeline or extension thereof.

CERTIFICATE

SEC. 10. (a) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person who has, under applicable State law, filed and secured approval of a water permit, or obtained other appropriate authority or right for the reservation, appropriation, use, diversion, dedication, or exportation of water (or for any other claim or right to water), necessary to operate a coal pipeline or extension thereof, may apply to the Secretary and the Commission for issuance of a certificate under this section to construct, operate, and maintain such pipeline or extension.

(b) Not later than ten days after receipt of an application under subsection (a), the Secretary and the Commission shall notify the President thereof.

(c)(1) Not later than fifteen months after an application is filed under this section with the Commission, and after notice and an opportunity for a proceeding under section 10322 of title 49, United States Code, the Commission shall make determinations concerning—

(A) whether or not the applicant is fit, willing, and able to construct, operate, and maintain the proposed pipeline or extension and to comply with subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, and regulations of the Commission;

(B) whether or not the proposed pipeline or extension is or will be required by the present or future public convenience and necessity;

(C) the general route of the proposed pipeline or extension, including points of origin and destination;

(D) the capacity, or range of capacity, of the proposed pipeline or extension;

(E) any set aside for small and independent coal producers under paragraph (5) of this subsection; and

(F) any terms and conditions relating to the determinations made under subparagraphs (A) and (B).

(2) In making a determination under paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection, the Commission shall at a minimum consider and make findings on—

(A) evidence of public support for approval of the application;

(B) the extent to which the proposed pipeline or extension would have an economic impact on any other common carrier or would affect the type or level of transportation services of any other common carrier; and

(C) the past record, written plan, and sufficiency of assurances that the applicant will make maximum use of minority employees and minority-owned enterprises in the construction, operation, and maintenance, of the proposed pipeline or extension.

(3) A determination concerning whether or not an applicant is fit, willing, and able under this subsection includes, among other things, financial fitness, operational fitness, and safety fitness.

(4) In making a determination concerning the capacity of a coal pipeline or extension to be authorized under this section, the Commission shall consider—

(A) any contracts for the transportation of coal by such pipeline or extension entered into or proposed on or before the date the application for the certificate is filed under this section;

(B) any contracts for the transportation of coal which may be reasonably anticipated to be entered into after such date; and

(C) such other factors as may be relevant to such recommendation.

(5) For purposes of protecting small and independent coal producers, the Commission shall make a determination that the applicant shall set aside and use for transportation of coal from such producers, the lesser of—

(A) 10 per centum of the total pipeline capacity, or

(B) that portion of the total pipeline capacity, if any, necessary to satisfy the total pipeline transportation demand of all such producers located in the geographic region (as determined by the Commission) to be served by the pipeline or extension.

(6) If the Commission fails to find that the applicant is fit, willing, and able under this section or that the proposed pipeline or extension is or will be required by the future public convenience and necessity, the Commission shall make a determination that a certificate not be issued.

(d)(1) Not later than fifteen months after an application is filed under this section with the Secretary, the Secretary shall make determinations concerning—

(A) whether or not construction, operation, and maintenance of the coal pipeline or extension is in the national interest; and

(B) any terms and conditions relating to the determination made under subparagraph (A).

(2) In making a determination under paragraph (1)(A) of this subsection, the Secretary shall consider and make findings on the extent to which—

(A) the proposed pipeline or extension would help meet national needs for coal utilization;

(B) the proposed pipeline or extension would enhance competition in the coal market and provide new market outlets and opportunities for coal producers, including small and independent coal producers;

(C) the proposed pipeline or extension would contribute to the national security by encouraging the displacement of imported petroleum, petroleum products, and coal with domestic coal; and

(D) the proposed pipeline or extension would affect the environment including, but not limited to, a finding as to whether the proposed pipeline or extension would unduly impact on the surface and groundwater at the point of destination and at the point of disposal of such water into the environment.

(3) Any determination by the Secretary under this section shall be made after notice and opportunity for presentation of written data, views, and arguments in accordance with section 553 of title 5, United States Code.

(4) If the Secretary fails to find that the construction, operation, and maintenance of the pipeline or extension is in the national interest, the Secretary shall make a determination that a certificate not be issued.

(e)(1) Not later than thirty days after receipt of an application under subsection (a), the Secretary and the Commission shall notify the Attorney General of their consideration of the application for a certificate under this section. The Secretary and the Commission shall provide such information as the Attorney General shall require to conduct an antitrust review to determine the likely effects upon competition associated with the issuance of such certificate. The Attorney General shall have one hundred and twenty days from the date of receipt of such notification to conduct such review and to advise the Secretary and the Commission with respect thereto, including specific findings and recommendations for the inclusion in the certificate of reasonable terms and conditions deemed necessary to protect and promote competition. Such terms and conditions may include any term or condition relating to ownership or use of the proposed pipeline or extension. An antitrust review authorized by this subsection shall be deemed to be an "antitrust investigation" within the meaning of the Antitrust Civil Process Act (15 U.S.C. 1311, et seq.). No certificate shall be issued under this section unless the Attorney General shall have advised the Secretary and the Commission in writing that, on the basis of such review, approval of the application and operation of the proposed pipeline or extension will not be inconsistent with the antitrust laws. The Secretary and the Commission may consult with the Attorney General on issues relating to any application for a certificate under this section.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection, nothing contained in this Act shall impair, amend, broaden, or modify the antitrust laws.

(3) Nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall be deemed to grant to any person immunity from civil or criminal liability, or to create defenses to actions under the antitrust laws.

(f)(1) An application for a certificate under this section shall be filed with the Secretary and the Commission and shall—

(A) be under oath;

(B) contain—

(i) a plan for construction, operation, maintenance, and routing of the coal pipeline or extension thereof,

(ii) the proposed capacity of such pipeline or extension,

(iii) the size of the right-of-way necessary to construct, operate, and maintain such pipeline or extension, and

(iv) such other information as the Secretary or the Commission or both may require by regulation; and

(C) contain a certification by the applicant that a copy of the application has been served on the chief executive officer of each State through which the proposed pipeline or extension passes and on such other persons (including government officials) as the Secretary or the Commission or both may designate by regulation.

Notice of the filing of the application shall be published in the Federal Register.

(2)(A) Each applicant for a certificate under this section shall reimburse the Secretary and the Commission for the administrative and other costs incurred by the Secretary and the Commission, respectively, in processing the application. Such reimbursement shall be provided in such manner as the Secretary and the Commission shall, by rule, prescribe.

(B) A deposit of any payments under subparagraph (A) intended to reimburse the United States for administrative and other costs with respect to any application filed under this section shall be required.

(C) The moneys received for administrative and other costs under this paragraph shall be deposited in the Treasury in a special account and are hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section for fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1984, and shall remain available until expended.

(3) The Secretary and the Commission shall expedite their respective hearings and proceedings and shall schedule all hearings, proposed findings and conclusions, and any recommended decisions so that their respective determinations under this section shall be issued and completed within fifteen months from the date of application.

(g) The Secretary and the Commission may not accept an application for a certificate under this section unless before the application is filed—

(1) the applicant has published, at least once a week, a notice of intention to file the application for at least four consecutive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in each county through which the proposed coal pipeline or extension thereof passes;

(2) the applicant sends a copy of such notice to the Secretary, the Commission, and to the chief executive officer of each State through which the proposed pipeline or extension passes; and

(3) the applicant takes such other steps as may be necessary to notify interested coal producers (including small and independent coal producers in the geographic region where the proposed pipeline or extension will originate) and coal users of the filing of such application.

Such notice shall, at a minimum, include the proposed route of the pipeline or extension and a general description of lands over, under, upon or through which the pipeline or extension will be constructed and indicate that any person who is interested in using the pipeline or extension to transport coal shall notify the applicant and the Commission of such interest in accordance with subsection (j) of this section.

(h)(1) Not later than the last day of the fifteen-month period beginning on the date an application is filed under this section, the Secretary and the Commission shall exchange copies of their respective determinations of whether or not a certificate shall be issued and any proposed terms and conditions relating to the issuance of such certificate made by the Secretary or the Commission, as the case may be.

(2) Not later than forty-five days after the date the Secretary and the Commission exchange copies of their determinations under this section, the Secretary and the Commission shall determine whether they agree or disagree on such determinations relating to issuance of the certificate and proposed terms and conditions. If the Secretary and the Commission agree that a certificate should be issued and on the terms and conditions to be included in the certificate, the Commission shall issue the certificate. If the Secretary and the Commission agree that a certificate should not be issued, the Commission shall not issue the certificate. If the Secretary and the Commission agree that a certificate should be issued but do not agree on any of the proposed terms and conditions to be included in the certificate, the Secretary and the Commission shall notify the President of such disagreement. If the Secretary and the Commission do not agree on whether or not a certificate should be issued, the Secretary and the Commission shall notify the President of such disagreement and of any disagreement with respect to proposed terms and conditions to be included in the certificate.

(3) Not later than ninety days after receiving any notification from the Secretary and the Commission under paragraph (2), the President shall make a final determination with respect to the disagreement or disagreements of which he is notified and shall direct the Commission not to issue the certificate or to issue the certificate with those terms and conditions that the President determines resolve the disagreement or disagreements.

(i) No certificate may be issued under this section unless an environmental impact statement is prepared with respect to the application for such certificate under section 102(2)(C) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (42 U.S.C. 4332(2)(C)).

(j)(1) In the case of a pipeline or extension thereof for which an application is submitted for a certificate under this section, any person interested in using the pipeline or extension to ship coal may notify the applicant and the Commission of such interest not later than ninety days after the application is filed with the Commission. Such notification shall specify the volume and type of coal which such person is interested in shipping.

(2) The Commission shall require that if the applicant makes an election under section 10951 of title 49, United States Code (relating to provision of coal pipeline transportation by contract), each person who notifies the applicant and the Commission in accordance with paragraph (1) of this subsection and who participates in proceedings held by the Commission under subsection (c) shall be entitled to a preference to enter into contracts for coal transportation service under section 10952 of title 49, United States Code.

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, no coal pipeline carrier shall be required to provide transportation of any coal which is not compatible with operation of the coal pipeline.

(k) Any transportation required to be set aside under this section for small and independent coal producers shall be provided to such producers on reasonable request or under nondiscriminatory contracts or both. The Commission shall establish procedures under title 49, United States Code, pursuant to which transportation of coal shall be provided to small and independent coal producers under this section and section 10951(b) of title 49, United States Code.

CERTAIN ADDITIONAL USES OF RIGHT-OF-WAY

SEC. 11. Nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall prevent any person or governmental entity from using the power of eminent domain under Federal or State law to acquire any portion of a right-of-way acquired in whole or part under this Act in any case in which the use of such right-of-way by such person or entity is consistent with the operation and maintenance of the coal pipeline.

UNDERGROUND CONSTRUCTION, SURVEYS, AND LAND RESTORATION

SEC. 12. (a) The line pipe of each coal pipeline and extension thereof for which a certificate is issued under section 10 of this Act shall to the maximum extent practicable, consistent with environmental protection, safety, and good engineering and technological practices, be located underground.

(b) Such line pipe shall be installed in a manner which minimizes interference with agricultural drainage systems. If damage to an existing agricultural drainage system occurs by installation of the line pipe, such system shall be modified, replaced, or restored by the coal pipeline carrier to proper working order to the maximum extent possible.

(c) Upon completion of construction of the pipeline or extension, a survey of the pipeline or extension and the right-of-way shall be conducted and recorded under the applicable statutes, if any, of the State or States in which the pipeline or extension and right-of-way are located.

(d) Upon completion of construction of any coal pipeline or extension thereof with respect to which a certificate is issued under section 10 of this Act, the coal pipeline carrier—

(1) shall, to the extent consistent with the operation and maintenance of the pipeline or extension, provide for replacement of sufficient topsoil, revegetation, restoration, and curtailment of erosion with respect to lands over, under, upon, and through which the pipeline or extension is constructed in order to return such lands to their preconstruction condition; and

(2) shall, wherever possible and where consistent with operation and maintenance of the pipeline or extension, allow lands acquired through exercise of the power of eminent domain under section 9 of this Act to be used for the purposes for which they were used before such construction.

ENFORCEMENT AND PENALTIES

SEC. 13. (a) At the request of the Secretary or the Commission, the Attorney General may institute a civil action in the appropriate United States district court for a restraining order or injunction or other appropriate remedy to enforce any provision of this Act or any regulation or order issued under the authority of this Act.

(b) If any person shall fail to comply with any provision of this Act, or any regulation or order issued under the authority of this Act, after notice of such failure and expiration of any period allowed for corrective action, such person shall be liable for a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure. The Secretary or the Commission, as the case may be, may assess, compromise, and collect any such penalty.

(c) Any person who knowingly and willfully violates any provision of this Act or any regulation or order issued under the authority of this Act, or makes any false statement, representation, or certification in any application, record, report, plan, or other document filed or required to be maintained under this Act shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

(d) Whenever a person violates any provision of this Act or any regulation or order issued under the authority of this Act, any director, officer, or agent of such person who knowingly and willfully authorized, ordered, or carried out such violation shall be subject to the same fines or imprisonment as set forth under subsection (c) of this section.

(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed as reducing or limiting the enforcement authorities vested in the Secretary by any other provision of law.

(f) This section does not apply to violations of section 15 or 16 of this Act or to violations of the amendments made by section 14 of this Act, or to any regulation or order issued under such section 15 or 16 or amendments made by such section 14.

AMENDMENT TO INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

SEC. 14. (a) Chapter 109 of title 49, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER III—COAL PIPELINE CARRIERS

"§ 10951. Election of contract service

"(a)(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, any coal pipeline carrier may elect to use all or any part of the pipeline's capacity to provide coal pipeline transportation under contracts. Any such carrier may enter into contracts with shippers of coal to provide specific services under specified rates and conditions but may not unreasonably discriminate among shippers ready, willing, and able to enter into such contracts.

"(2) Under rules promulgated by the Commission, an election under this subsection shall be filed with the Commission. Before such election may be filed, the carrier shall—

"(A) publish a notice of intention to file such election for at least 4 consecutive weeks in each county through which the coal pipeline or extension thereof passes or is proposed to pass; and

"(B) send a copy of such notice to the Commission and, in the case of a certificated pipeline or extension, to each preferred shipper of the pipeline or extension.

Such notice shall, at a minimum, include the route of the pipeline or extension and indicate that any person who is interested in using the pipeline or extension to transport coal shall notify the carrier and the Commission of such interest.

"(b)(1) No election may be made under subsection (a) with respect to any portion of the capacity of a coal pipeline or extension thereof set aside under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 for transportation of coal owned by small and independent coal producers.

"(2) In the case of a coal pipeline carrier filing an election under subsection (a) who does not hold a certificate issued under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, the Commission shall order the carrier to set aside and use a percentage of the total pipeline capacity for transportation of coal owned by small and independent coal producers. Such order shall be issued after notice and an opportunity for a proceeding under section 10322 of this subtitle but not later than 60 days after the election is filed under subsection (a). Such set aside shall be determined by the Commission in accordance with section 10(c) of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983. The transportation required to be set aside under this subsection shall be provided to small and independent coal producers on reasonable request or under nondiscriminatory contracts or both. The Commission shall establish procedures pursuant to which transportation of coal shall be provided to small and independent coal producers under this section and section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983.

"§ 10952. Establishment of initial coal pipeline carrier obligation; contracts subject to initial obligation

"(a) Not later than 60 days after an election is filed with the Commission under section 10951 by a coal pipeline carrier, any shipper may request the carrier to transport a specific volume of coal under contract and shall notify the Commission and the carrier of the volume and type of coal which such shipper requests the carrier to transport under contract.

"(b) Not later than 90 days after the date required for shippers to request transportation service from any coal pipeline carrier under subsection (a), the Commission shall determine under this section the volume of coal, if any, which the carrier shall be obligated to transport for each shipper who makes a request in accordance with subsection (a). The volume shall be that volume of coal for which the Commission determines each initial shipper shows need (and which is not required to be set aside for small and independent coal producers). In the case of a carrier who holds a certificate issued under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, each initial shipper who is entitled to a preference under subsection (j) of such section to coal transportation service provided under contract by such carrier shall be given a preference for such service. In any case in which the capacity elected by the carrier for contract service (and not required to be set aside for small and independent producers) under section 10951 is less than the capacity necessary to satisfy the needs of all initial shippers, as determined by the Commission, the Commission shall determine each initial shipper's equitable share of the contract capacity.

"(c) If the Commission finds that extension of the coal pipeline to the facilities of a shipper is technologically, operationally, and economically feasible, the Commission may order the carrier to extend the coal pipeline to such facilities.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subchapter, no coal pipeline carrier shall be required to provide transportation of any coal which is not compatible with operation of the coal pipeline.

"(e)(1) Not later than 60 days after the date on which the Commission makes the determination under subsection (b) regarding the carrier's obligation to each initial shipper, the carrier may enter into contracts with such shippers pursuant to the provisions of section 10954.

"(2) Any initial shipper may waive all or part of the obligation established with respect to such shipper under this section.

"(f)(1) Any initial shipper may file a complaint under section 10954 regarding a contract to which this section applies.

"(2) If a carrier which the Commission determines under subsection (b) has an obligation does not enter into a contract with any initial shipper in the 60-day period provided for entering into such contracts, such shipper may file with the Commission a complaint regarding the carrier's obligation to such shipper. Such complaint must be filed not later than 60 days after the last day of the 60-day period so provided. Not later than 120 days after such complaint is filed, the Commission shall issue a final decision on such complaint.

"(3) Upon review of a complaint or upon its own motion, the Commission may order the coal pipeline carrier to provide transportation of coal to any shipper in accordance with the requirements of this subchapter. If the Commission—

"(A) on complaint of any initial shipper, determines that—

"(i) the carrier did not enter into a contract to provide transportation service to such shipper for the volume of coal which the Commission determines to be obligation of the carrier to that shipper under subsection (b); and

"(ii) the shipper was ready, willing, and able to enter into a contract for such service; or

"(B) on its own motion, disapproves under section 10954 any contract between a pipeline and an initial or preferred shipper; the Commission shall order the carrier to provide service to the shipper concerned for a volume of coal which conforms to the obligation to such shipper established under subsection (b) and which is nondiscriminatory. If the Commission issues such an order respecting any complaining shipper and if such shipper subsequently enters into a contract with the carrier, the contract shall be deemed to satisfy the requirements of such an order. In the absence of a contract, rates and other terms and conditions for transportation ordered under this subsection shall be determined by the Commission, taking into account the determination made by the Commission under subsection (b), terms and conditions of any contracts which the carrier entered into with other shippers with respect to the coal pipeline, and any increased costs resulting from any extension of the coal pipeline to the facilities of the complaining shipper.

"§ 10953. Contracts not subject to initial carrier obligation

"In any case in which a coal pipeline carrier has satisfied the carrier's obligation under section 10952, and in any case in which a prior contract entered into under this subchapter expires, subject to section 10951(a), the carrier may enter into other contracts under this section with shippers of coal to provide specific services under specified rates and conditions. Such contracts shall not be subject to the obligations established under section 10952.

"§ 10954. Approval and disapproval of contracts

"(a)(1) A coal pipeline carrier who files an election under section 10951 may not enter into contracts for the transportation of coal except as provided in this subchapter. Each such contract shall be filed with the Commission not later than 10 days after the the contract is entered into.

"(2) Before a contract filed under this section may become effective, it shall be approved by the Commission in accordance with this subchapter.

"(3) In any case in which one of the parties to the contract is an electric utility with respect to which any State agency or the Tennessee Valley Authority has ratemaking authority, such contract shall be filed with the Commission together with a certification that a copy of such contract has been filed with the State agency or the Tennessee Valley Authority, as the case may be.

"(b) The Commission shall publish special tariff rules for contracts filed under this subchapter in order to assure that the essential terms of such contracts are available to the general public in tariff format.

"(c)(1) Not later than 60 days after the date of filing of a contract under this section, the Commission may, on its own motion or on complaint of any shipper, the Tennessee Valley Authority, or any State agency which has ratemaking authority with respect to the sale of electric energy by any electric utility, begin a proceeding to review such contract.

"(2) Not later than 60 days after the date of filing of a contract, or, if the Commission begins a proceeding to review the contract, 120 days after such date, the Commission shall approve or disapprove the contract.

"(d) The Commission shall not approve any contract for the transportation of coal by pipeline under this subchapter—

"(1) if the contract violates section 10951 or 10952(b),

"(2) if the contract constitutes a destructive competitive practice,

"(3) if approval of the contract would result in a total volume of coal obligated for transportation under this subchapter which exceeds, in any period, the capacity of the pipeline with respect to which the carrier made an election under section 10951 and which is not required to be set aside for small and independent coal producers, or

"(4) in the case of a pipeline with respect to which a certificate is issued under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, if the contract would violate any term or condition of such certificate.

"(e) Approval of a contract filed under this section shall be effective—

"(1) on the date the Commission expressly approves such contract, but in no event before the end of the 60-day period beginning on the date the contract is filed or after the end of the 180-day period beginning on such date; or

"(2) if the Commission has not disapproved such contract by the end of the 180-day period beginning on the date the contract is filed, at the end of the 180-day period.

"(f)(1) Any contract approved under this subchapter shall allow the coal pipeline carrier to interrupt or discontinue service under such contract to provide such service as the Commission may order under this subchapter or under section 11128.

"(2) Except as provided under paragraph (1), a coal pipeline carrier shall not have the right or obligation to interrupt service under a contract approved under this section for the purpose of prorating pipeline service to other shippers unless the terms of the contract provide otherwise.

"(g)(1) The provisions of chapter 107 (other than section 10721) of this subtitle shall not apply to any contract approved under this subchapter.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 10102(4) of this subtitle, a coal pipeline carrier providing transportation of coal by pipeline under a contract approved under this subchapter shall not be a common carrier for purposes of this subtitle with respect to such transportation.

"(h)(1) A contract approved under this subchapter and transportation under such contract, shall not be subject to other provisions of this subtitle, and may not be subsequently challenged before the Commission or any court on the grounds that such contract violates a provision of this subtitle other than a provision contained in this subchapter.

"(2) After approval of any contract under this subchapter, the exclusive remedy for any alleged breach of such contract shall be in an action in an appropriate State court or United States district court, unless the parties otherwise agree.

"§ 10955. Miscellaneous provisions

"(a) Nothing in this subchapter shall be construed to prevent the Attorney General from participating in or instituting any proceeding before the Commission under this subchapter to ensure that any contract entered into under this subchapter is consistent with the antitrust laws.

"(b) Any capacity of a coal pipeline not subject to a contract approved under section 10954, an order of the Commission under section 10952, or a set aside for small and independent producers under section 10 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 or section 10951 shall be used to provide transportation of coal as a common carrier in accordance with this subtitle.

"(c) To the extent provided under regulations issued by the Commission, modifications of a contract approved under this subchapter shall be subject to the same requirements under this subchapter as the original contract. Nothing in this subsection regarding the modification of a contract shall be construed as impairing or adversely affecting any obligation under the original contract until the Commission has completed its review of the modification.

"(d) Not later than 120 days after the date of the enactment of this subchapter, the Commission shall issue regulations to carry out this subchapter (including, but not limited to, regulations concerning the provision of notice to initial shipper of the filing of contracts under section 10954).

"§ 10956. Definitions

"(a) As used in this subchapter, the terms—

"(1) 'electric utility' means any person, State agency, or Federal agency, which sells electric energy.

"(2) 'State agency' means any State, political subdivision thereof, and any agency or instrumentality of either.

"(3) 'initial shipper' means a shipper of coal who requests contract service in accordance with section 10952(a) of this subchapter.

"(4) 'preferred shipper' means, with respect to any certificated coal pipeline carrier, an initial shipper who is entitled to a preference under section 10(j) of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 for coal transportation service provided under contract by the carrier.

"(b) The terms defined in section 4 of the Coal Pipeline Act of 1983 shall, when used in this subchapter, have the meanings provided by such section 4.".

(b) The analysis for chapter 109 of title 49, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SUBCHAPTER III—COAL PIPELINE CARRIERS

"10951. Election of contract service.
"10952. Establishment of initial coal pipeline carrier obligation; contracts subject to initial obligation.
"10953. Contracts not subject to initial carrier obligation.
"10954. Approval and disapproval of contracts.
"10955. Miscellaneous provisions.
"10956. Definitions.".

(c) The second sentence of section 10322(a) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting "10951, 10952, 10954," after "10935,".

(d) Subchapter III of chapter 109 of title 49, United States Code, as added by subsection (a) of this section, shall not affect the validity or enforceability of any contract in effect before the date of enactment of this Act and entered into by a coal pipeline carrier and a shipper of coal. After the date of enactment of this Act, such contract shall be deemed a contract entered into in accordance with the provisions of such subchapter and approved under such subchapter.

COAL PIPELINE SAFETY

SEC. 15. (a)(1) Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Transportation shall issue regulations establishing uniform Federal standards for the safe design, installation, inspection, emergency plans and procedures, testing, construction, extension, operation, replacement, and maintenance of the facilities of a coal pipeline or extension thereof. Standards adopted under this subsection affecting the design, installation, construction, initial inspection, and initial testing shall not be applicable to facilities of a coal pipeline or extension thereof in existence or under construction on the date such standards are adopted or with respect to which a final environmental statement has been issued before or on such date.

(2) The Secretary of Transportation may, upon application by the person owning or operating a coal pipeline, waive (in whole or in part) compliance of any standard issued under this section if the Secretary of Transportation determines that such waiver is consistent with coal pipeline safety.

(3) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorize the Secretary of Transportation to issue regulations establishing Federal standards prescribing the siting or the routing of any coal pipeline.

(4) Except as provided in paragraph (5), after the effective date of regulations issued by the Secretary of Transportation under paragraph (1) of this subsection, no State, or political subdivision of a State may adopt or enforce any safety standards applicable to the construction, operation, or maintenance of any coal pipeline or extension thereof to which the Federal standards established under such paragraph apply.

(5) Nothing in this section shall be construed to preempt or otherwise affect any State law, regulation, or standard which imposes any additional or more stringent standard than any Federal standard established under this section except any such State law, regulation, or standard which discriminates against any coal pipeline or has the effect of prohibiting the construction, operation, maintenance, or extension of any coal pipeline.

(b) At the request of the Secretary of Transportation, the Attorney General may institute a civil action in the appropriate United States district court for a restraining order or injunction or other appropriate remedy to enforce any regulation or order issued under this section.

(c) If any person shall fail to comply with any regulation or order issued under this section, after notice of such failure and expiration of any period allowed for corrective action, such person shall be liable for a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure. The Secretary of Transportation may assess, compromise, and collect any such penalty.

(d) Any person who knowingly and willfully violates any regulation or order issued under this section or knowingly and willfully makes any false statement, representation, or certification in any application, record, report, plan, or other document filed or required to be maintained under this section shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

(e) Whenever a person violates any regulation or order issued under this section, any director, officer, or agent of such person who knowingly and willfully authorized, ordered, or carried out such violation shall be subject to the same fines or imprisonment as set forth under subsection (d) of this section.

CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS

SEC. 16. A purchaser, consumer, or user (including an electric utility) of coal to be transported through a coal pipeline for which a certificate is issued under section 10 of this Act may not require a customer to pay a fee, surcharge, tariff, or other payment relating to the cost of construction of the coal pipeline at any time prior to the commencement of operation of the pipeline.

BUY AMERICAN

SEC. 17. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, all articles, materials, and supplies used in the construction and maintenance of a coal pipeline for which a certificate is issued under section 10 of this Act shall have been manufactured in the United States from articles, materials, and supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States.

(b) The Commission may, upon application of a person holding a certificate issued under section 10 of this Act, exempt such person from the requirements of subsection (a) of this section with respect to the purchase of particular articles, materials, or supplies, if the Commission determine that—

(1) the application of such requirements with respect to such articles, materials, or supplies would be inconsistent with the public interest;

(2) such articles, materials, or supplies, or the articles, materials, or supplies from which they are manufactured are not mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States in sufficient and reasonably available commercial quantities or of a satisfactory quality;

(3) inclusion of such articles, materials, or supplies will increase the cost of the overall project contract by more than 25 per centum; or

(4) the cost of the articles, materials, or supplies to be purchased is less than $50,000.

(c) The provisions of this section shall not apply in the case of articles, materials, or supplies purchased pursuant to a contract entered into before the date of enactment of this Act.

(d) In this section, "United States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States.

CONTINUING JURISDICTION OF STATE PUBLIC UTILITY COMMISSIONS

SEC. 18. Nothing in this Act (except section 16) shall be construed to diminish, preempt, or modify the ratemaking authority of any State utility regulatory agency or the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as we go into what could be a long and productive day here, I would like to summarize our position on some of the main issues we will be debating today and that we debated the other day.

The railroads, in the first place, complain about the pipeline industry maybe coming in and getting some Federal help or Federal assistance here. The railroads have already benefited by being given Federal eminent domain, the land grant railroads. The land grant railroads were also given more than 130 million acres in fee by the United States. That is bigger than the State of California.

According to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the railroads are able to compete with coal pipelines and coal slurry will not transport more than a small percentage of the coal shipped in the United States. This point should perhaps be underlined again.

We now produce about 800 million tons of coal. That is expected to go to 1.2 billion tons of coal in 1990 and to 1.4 billion tons of coal before we get to the end of this century. If we build every pipeline that everybody has dreamed about building, we will still have most of this increase handled by the railroads.

The railroads have told us repeatedly in the debate that they are what the Interstate Commerce Commission calls "revenue inadequate," which is a strong way of saying, I guess, they do not have much money. Well, in 1983, the CSX Corps., a revenue inadequate railroad agreed to purchase Texas Gas Resources for $1 billion. In 1982, Norfolk & Southern Railroad another revenue inadequate railroad purchased 20 percent of Piedmont Airlines for $57 million.

So before you shed too many tears for the railroads and their financial position, you might see where they are putting their money, to improve the railroads or to do something else.

One more: In 1983, the Burlington Northern purchased El Paso Gas Co. for $700 million.

Let me make another point now. Most coal shipped in the United States is captive to the railroads. Sixty-five percent of all coal shipped is by rail, and 85 percent of that rail shipment is captive.

Three railroads, Burlington Northern, CSX, and Norfolk & Southern carry almost 75 percent of all the coal shipped by rail.

Railway stocks are up, according to Transportation Week. Rail stock is booming. So the railroads are not quite the bankrupt, barefoot organizations we have heard about.

One of the things that concerns me is that we have had a steadily increasing and worsening balance of trade and balance of payments. It is the worst in modern times. We are the Saudi Arabia of coal, we are told, and here is a place we could make a real bite in our favor in the balance of trade. Yet we are going in the other direction. This great country, with all of our coal reserves, is going in the other direction.

Since 1974, utilities in Florida and Texas have imported coal from Poland, South Africa and Australia every year. There was a big article last week that a big new coal mine in Colombia, South America, a joint venture of Exxon and the Colombian Carbocol Co., is due to come on line in 1986, and this mine is seeking customers along the U.S. gulf coast. The National Coal Association fears that they may lose 6 to 20 million tons per year to this Colombian coal operation largely because of high inland rail rates, make U.S. coal uncompetitive.

The U.S. Department of Commerce says that several countries have expressed concern over high inland shipping rates in the United States, and these shipping costs make the U.S. coal not competitive in the export market.

Finally, the argument has been made a lot of times on environmental terms on the pipelines, and I wish to make the point again that pipelines are more environmentally sound than railroads.

□ 1310

There has been kind of a reflexive reaction by some of my environmental friends, and I have had disagreements from time to time with these groups. On environmental grounds there seems to be a kind of a reflex action that high technology is bad, this is high technology, and, therefore, it must be bad. This comes from some of the environmental people I have talked to.

Well, coal slurry is very good technology. Let me give a contrast here. The OTA study said that a 100-car unit train spews out about 10 tons of coal dust per trip. The trains are noisy, they emit pollutants, they disrupt communities, and they require many highway grade crossings, and so on.

Pipelines are underground. We never know they are there until they send the money in to pay their taxes. They make no emissions to the air, and they will be subject to Federal and State water discharge requirements if that should occur. In the 13 years the Black Mesa coal slurry line has been operating there has been only one serious spill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. UDALL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. UDALL. There was no serious damage done as a result of that spill. Compare this with 10 tons of coal dust per unit train and the damage that is done, it seems like almost every week, with toxic chemical spills from train traffic.

The bill gives every conceivable protection to landowners and farmers. The gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY) and I worked out at great length a new section on water which says that every water use decision has to be made by the States. If the States want to use their water for agriculture rather than for coal pipelines, they can. State law controls the issue of land value, siting of pipelines, and right to trial by jury, and all actions have to be brought in the State courts unless the landowner chooses the Federal court. The landowner collects attorney fees if the pipeline does not offer fair value. You cannot bring an eminent domain action unless you have negotiated first. The pipeline will be underground, and the pipeline companies will have to replace topsoil and all the rest.

Mr. Chairman, I will make one final point. The whole idea of eminent domain is unique to this country, and it says that we want commerce and we want to encourage shipments between the States, and eminent domain is the device by which we express that competitive attitude in our system.

Coal pipelines are apparently the only kind of transportation system that have ever had this hostile war waged against them. Right now I can go to Wyoming and buy up coal and I can buy up water on a willing-buyer-and-seller basis, I can construct a mine-mouth powerplant, and I can put that coal into the form of electricity and carry it across anybody's land anywhere in the country. This is already in the books. Transmission lines can get eminent domain in almost every conceivable situation, and yet we say to this poor, fragile industry that wants a chance to compete, "You don't get eminent domain."

Why? "Well, the railroads don't want you to have eminent domain, and they don't want you to have eminent domain because they enjoy a monopoly in many aspects of coal hauling."

Mr. Chairman, that is what this bill is all about, and this bill ought to be passed.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the debate over coal pipeline legislation there has been much misunderstanding about what this bill actually does and does not do.

Let me make clear that this bill does not authorize the construction of one single coal pipeline. All it does is set forth the conditions and procedures whereby the sponsors of a proposed coal pipeline may secure the right of Federal eminent domain. This right will not be conferred as a routine matter. A proposed pipeline will have to meet important economic, technical, and governmental qualifications before it can even be considered for the right of eminent domain.

At the outset, a proposed pipeline must obtain initial funding to sustain the formative stages of the project.

The proposed pipeline must identify a market and obtain letters of intent or other such evidence of interest that will justify the expenditures necessary to obtain a supply of water; and perform initial engineering in order to determine whether the project is viable.

The proposed pipeline must then secure a source of water from the State where it will originate or from a nearby State.

With a water source in hand, the proposed pipeline must then file an application with the Federal agency to be designated by Congress in H.R. 1010 (Interior, the ICC or both) and pursue that application in accordance with the specific requirements set forth in H.R. 1010. Once the agency has concluded that a grant of eminent domain powers is justified, many obstacles still remain before the pipeline becomes a reality.

The pipeline must first obtain contracts for coal transportation. The railroads will compete for this business and, just as in the recent AP&L case, sometimes will win.

The pipeline contracts may then be challenged by the railroads both at the State PUC level and at the ICC.

The pipeline must then obtain financing.

Rights-of-way must be obtained, sometimes through the exercise of the Federal eminent domain authority in the State courts.

All environmental permits and other permits must be obtained from the Federal Government, States and local governments. ETSI (which will move coal from Wyoming to Texas) will require over 500 permits.

Final engineering must be completed.

The pipeline system must be constructed.

Anyone who looks at this obstacle course must conclude that coal pipelines would not come easily. Only a few coal pipelines will in fact be built and they will be built where the cost effectiveness of coal pipelines is indispensable to preserving foreign and domestic markets for U.S. coal.

In conclusion, let me again emphasize that enactment of coal pipeline legislation does not assure the development of a coal pipeline industry. What it does do is provide the opportunity for this new technology to prove itself in the marketplace.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SHUSTER was allowed to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, let me say, first of all, that I have the greatest respect for the gentlemen who have been speaking in the well today in support of coal slurry pipelines, and, most particularly, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL). He is indeed a giant in this House. He is one of the most capable, distinguished, articulate, and respected Members of this body, and I wish I could support this legislation today if for no other reason than because of my admiration for the distinguished gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

But I cannot support this legislation today because I believe it is even worse than the legislation which we had brought before this House in 1978, legislation which at that time was overwhelmingly defeated. And what we have before us today is legislation which deserves to be defeated, even more so than the legislation brought before us on coal slurry pipelines just a few years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I have 60 amendments in the RECORD. I put those amendments in the RECORD to protect us because, as we all know, at the last minute there was a new bill put together from the two bills from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. It is not my intention to offer most of those 60 amendments today. It is my intention for us to come to grips with the issue of coal slurry pipelines, and I believe this legislation can be defeated on its merits as it is presented to us today.

However, a point should be made. Even if we could wave a magic wand and make this irredeemable piece of bad legislation somehow acceptable, it would be an exercise in futility. I think this is an extremely important point. It would be an exercise in futility for my colleagues because, if we look at the makeup of the conference when the House goes to conference with the Senate, we will see that the House makeup will be controlled by the advocates of coal slurry pipelines. So even if we were able to get through some amendments which might somehow partially improve this piece of legislation, it would be a Pyrrhic victory. We would see it go up in smoke because what we thought we had done here today would undoubtedly be undone in the conference.

So as we consider amendments brought before this House today, let us not be deceived, let us not be beguiled, let us not be misled. Any amendments which are adopted on the floor today would in all probability be stripped out by the coal slurry people when the legislation moved to the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, in general debate, we outlined 16 reasons, any one of which is reason alone for defeating this special interest legislation. I certainly do not intend to touch upon all of those points now, but I do intend to touch upon a few of them.

□ 1320

The first point that I would hope to emphasize centers on the misinformation which has been put out concerning this legislation.

First of all, we have been told time and time again, in fact it was regrettable to read in both the Washington Post and in the New York Times articles which said that coal slurry pipeline legislation was needed because the railroads will not let coal slurry pipelines cross their tracks.

Now, for the umpteenth time, Mr. Chairman, we have said again and again, those of us who oppose this legislation would support a simple limited eminent domain piece of legislation which provided only for coal slurry pipelines to cross railroad tracks. We made that offer time and time again and it has been rejected, showing that this argument which seems so appealing on the surface is nothing more than a red herring. It is a red herring.

The issue before us today is not the issue of letting coal slurry pipelines cross railroad tracks, but rather, a much more complicated set of issues which deal with State's rights, water rights, environment, a balanced transportation system and on and on; so for the umpteenth time, this issue should be put to rest.

The second piece of misinformation which should be put to rest, Mr. Chairman, is that we heard recited in general debate twice a purported letter which was sent from Martin Van Buren, which somehow seemed to be translated into suggesting that coal slurry pipelines should be built and given the right of eminent domain.

Then, beyond hearing that in general debate, this morning we opened our Washington Post newspaper and saw a full page ad, paid for by the coal slurry lobbyists, and the centerpiece of this ad was that letter, that purported letter written in January 1829 by Martin Van Buren to Andrew Jackson concerning canals and railroads.

There is one minor problem, Mr. Chairman. The letter never existed. The letter never was written. It is a hoax.

We turned to the Library of Congress. They researched it. I put into the RECORD the entire contents of their letter to me; but in a nutshell they say, "We have seen more than a dozen examples over the last several years of a letter purported to have been written in January 1829 by Van Buren to Jackson," and they go on to say that all the available evidence indicates very strongly that it is spurious; so we should put that little piece of misinformation to rest also, Mr. Chairman.

Now, turning to what I believe is a much more substantive issue, and that is the issue of the probability of monopolistic control being seized in this country if this legislation passes by big coal, big oil, big pipelines, and big utilities, to the detriment of the consumers in America.

Mr. Chairman, there is new evidence which is available since we last debated this legislation on the floor here in 1978. I think for those Members who care and are concerned about monopolistic power grabs by giant corporations, who are concerned about the implications of vertical integration and what it means in terms of gouging consumers, should be very much concerned about the whole issue of vertical integration if, indeed, this legislation passes today.

Let us take a look at some of the proposed coal slurry pipelines and just see who is going to control what.

First of all, the Allen-Warner pipeline is owned entirely by the Nevada Power Corp. In addition, they own the coal field which would supply the pipeline; so what do we have? Big coal into big pipelines into big utilities, the first example of monopolistic control if, indeed, we pass this legislation today.

Let us take another look at a proposed pipeline, the ETSI, owned by Texas Eastern, which has two oil company subsidiaries. Skyline Oil is heavily involved in a joint venture with Amoco involving ETSI and the Bechtel Corp., which would be a major owner of the pipeline, owns Peabody Coal, the largest coal producer in the United States.

So what do we have here? Once again, big coal vertically integrated with pipelines and oil, a limitation of competition, rather than an increase in competition.

But let us go beyond these two particular proposed pipelines. Let is look at the NICES pipelines, the so-called Northwest proposed pipeline. The partners in this are the Northwest Pipeline Co. Bechtel again, the owner of the largest coal corporation in America, and just recently Shell Oil announced their intention of acquiring the ownership of all of this; Shell Oil, which just last week announced that there might be alternatives to using water with coal slurry pipelines. They said they could solve the problem of scarce water by using methanol. Just last week Shell referred to that.

Now, if methanol is going to be used to transfer coal slurries, where are the environmental studies to show that methanol is safe?

This bill has no limitations, no prohibitions against the use of methanol, so we could find ourselves faced with a highly explosive environmentally unsound method of transportatioan handed over to the major oil companies and the major pipelines and the major coal companies to be used in vertical integration.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. TRAXLER). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BREAUX. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do so not to interrupt the eloquence of the speaker in the well, but it sounds an awful lot like this is the type of thing we discussed during the general debate period and since we are now under the 5-minute rule, I was wondering if we, indeed, plan to move on under the 5-minute rule?

Under my reservation, I would just ask the gentleman, are we talking about amendments, or are we sort of continuing general debate?

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that we appreciate the fact the leadership on the gentleman's side scheduled general debate on both dates for this legislation after all votes were over and after most of the Members left, so the Members were not here to have the opportunity to hear some of these key points. Of course, I am only following in the same footsteps of the distinguished chairman who first sought recognition by striking the requisite number of words.

Mr. BREAUX. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I note that we have been operating under the reservation now for about 15 minutes. I was just wondering, could the gentleman, before we handle the unanimous consent, give us an idea of how much longer we are going to take under this procedure?

Mr. SHUSTER. I am hopeful that I might conclude my statement in the next 5 minutes. That would be my intention.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER) to proceed for an additional 5 minutes?

Mr. KAZEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to get in on this debate, too. I spoke when nobody was on the floor. Does this entitle me to go over everything that we have already discussed in general debate?

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would say to my good friend that it is not my intention to go over everything that we have discussed in general debate. I am simply following the same procedure followed by the distinguished chairman of the Interior Committee who was the first one on the floor today to seek recognition by moving to strike the requisite number of words.

Of course, my good friend, the gentleman from Texas, certainly has available to him that same right. I assure the gentleman that I would not move to cut off the gentleman's opportunity to speak under the same procedure.

Mr. KAZEN. To continue under my reservation, Mr. Chairman, all I want to point out to my colleague is that I do not mind the gentleman starting out like this, both the proponent, the gentleman from Arizona, and the gentleman in the well, laying the background for the debate; but from now on, let us get on to the amendment stage. We have been on this bill now for about 3 days.

Mr. SHUSTER. If I might respond, Mr. Chairman, I would say there is a point of view which has been circulated here that the leadership on the other side very purposely scheduled general debate in such a fashion so that there would be nobody here. Now, I do not subscribe to that point of view, but it has been suggested.

Mr. KAZEN. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would tell the gentleman that I do not, either. I do not appreciate speaking to an empty House, because I think that what I had to say was very important, particularly on the point of gouging consumers, and I have the ultimate case of utilities consumer gauging in the United States. I set it forth before this House and if need be, I will set it forth again.

I just want to abide with the rules of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER) to proceed for an additional 5 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, let us not just limit our discussion of the monopolistic vertical integration, the seeds of which are inherent in this legislation, to the proposed lines I have spoken of, but let us go on. Let us look at the next one, the Powder River coal slurry pipeline. The partners are the Mustang Fuel Co. and Michael Curran. So what do we have once again?

□ 1330

Big coal, big pipelines, big utilities, big oil—one more example of monopolistic vertical integration, if indeed, this legislation passes today.

But, beyond that, we look at Coalstream—another proposed pipeline—owned by Ashland Oil. In fact, Ashland Oil, which itself owns 1.5 billion tons of coal reserves—so, once again, we see big coal, big pipelines, big oil.

And finally, perhaps the favorite, Transco Vepco, very close to home here in Washington, D.C. Transco Coal Co., VEPCO—Virginia Electric & Power Co.—and just recently I understand in the past week or so Baltimore Gas & Electric has announced they would be one of the owners of this. And the A. T. Massey Coal Co. Once again—big coal, big pipelines, big utilities. I think that makes the point. I think that makes the point very clearly.

Virtually without exception, what we see here are big coal companies, big pipelines, big oil, big utilities, attempting to get a stranglehold, a hammerlock on the movement and ownership of this particular source of energy. And who is bound to pay the price in the long run for this kind of monopoly, or virtual monopoly—the consumer. And, in fact, I think it is very significant, Mr. Chairman, that we received testimony from the Justice Department saying that this vertical integration provides utility companies with the opportunity to skirt around, to avoid the ratemaking rate-of-return regulation that has been inherent historically in controlling the price of energy to consumers.

They said the vertical integration of electric utilities into coal production may provide an opportunity to evade the effects of rate-of-return regulation. And this is but 1 of the 16 reasons why this legislation should be defeated. It is anticompetitive. And if you think you have seen a problem in the past with the price gouging in natural gas pipelines, and this is not theoretical, many of us have experienced this, we are setting the stage here today for the same kind of monopolistic vertical integration, for the same kind of price gouging which so many consumers across America have already experienced with natural gas pipelines. This is the kind of experience which I think none can reasonably conclude we will find ourselves faced with in America if indeed we let this special interest legislation be passed today.

And for this reason, along with the 15 other reasons why we have urged for the defeat of this special interest legislation, I would urge my colleagues to vote to defeat this coal slurry pipeline legislation, which gives an extraordinary right to private corporations, the awesome right of the power of Federal eminent domain, the power to go in and condemn and take private property from the citizens of these United States of America.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I applaud the gentleman in the well for taking this time at the beginning of the amendment process to clarify and to respond to the arguments that were laid out by the chairman of the Interior Committee.

I think that it was unfortunate during the reservation on the unanimous consent for the extension of your remarks that the implication was that the gentleman in the well was trying to prolong this debate. In fact, as we began this amending process, there have been explanations on both sides, led by Mr. UDALL.

The key points that the gentleman made are clear—that those who are proposing to put in place coal slurry pipelines want to give national eminent domain without regard to many of the implications of much of that eminent domain for a very exclusive club of people who are going to try to use that to exploit and to use the coal resource.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(On request of Mr. EDGAR and by unanimous consent, Mr. SHUSTER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. EDGAR. If the gentleman would yield further.

I would underscore one provision that was not focused as deeply on by the gentleman and that is the whole question of water. Some of us are very concerned that in the Interior Committee's report it talks about the fact that these water concerns should receive attention from Congresses in the future. And it goes on to state that while the States of origin should be protected under the extraordinary powers of the commerce clause, those States who may be in downstream areas have little or no protection if there is not a water compact in place. And I think many of us who are concerned about the environmental questions focus on the issue of water.

So, what the gentleman has said is accurate. And I think if you look at some of the real questions, even if an amendment is accepted today on the House floor dealing with water, I think this legislation should be rejected for those reasons of environment and the reasons that the gentleman has suggested.

I commend the gentleman for his leadership on this issue.

Mr. SHUSTER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Chairman, last year marked the 20th year that coal pipeline legislation had been pending before the Congress. During those 20 years, we have witnessed many drastic and damaging swings in both the production and consumption of energy in the United States.

Probably the most important reason for the need for this legislation is to provide a long-term, stable, and economical supply of domestic energy. It is imperative that we, as a nation, utilize our domestic energy supplies thereby reducing our balance of international trade deficits and further insulating our country from any future energy supply disruptions from foreign countries.

This legislation is both a jobs bill and an infrastructure bill, but accomplishes those goals without Federal Government programs, subsidies, and expenditures. The construction of coal pipelines will lead to a rehabilitation and expansion of our port facilities, since a dependable and affordable supply of coal for export will be provided. Western European countries as well as Japan continue to express interest in purchasing U.S. coal which, unfortunately, remains economically prohibitive due to internal transportation costs from the mine mouth to port.

Other than objections to competition leveled against this legislation by railroads, the major problem in securing passage of a coal pipeline bill in the Congress has been in the development of adequate protection of surface and ground water in the Western States. With the most recent compromise included in this legislation, I firmly believe the essential protection of Western water and authority of the States to manage their water resources has been adequately addressed. In addition, far less water is required to slurry coal than is needed for mine mouth generation, liquification, and gasification.

Along with many other cities across the country, the city of San Antonio, Tex., which I am privileged to represent in the Congress, is a "captive shipper." It is dependent on one railroad to transport coal from the Powder River basin to be used in its municipally owned public utility. That railroad has through the years charged exhorbitant rates for the transportation of coal, utility rates have skyrocketed, and the consumers of San Antonio have indeed been gouged by the railroad. With the passage of the Staggers Rail Act, we were successful in providing some relief for San Antonio consumers, but to date, the Interstate Commerce Commission has failed to recognize the intent of Congress in the San Antonio cases and has bent over backward to show its prorailroad colors. I do not harbor any illusions about the legislation before us in terms of how quickly San Antonio and other hard-pressed cities will receive some relief. I do believe, however, that it will provide vital competition to the railroads in the transportation of coal and that competition will eventually, I hope and trust, force the railroads to stop using captive shippers like San Antonio for their own selfish purposes.

With only one exception, all coal pipelines which have been proposed cross State boundaries, clearly placing coal pipelines under the purview of the commerce clauses contained in the Constitution. Congress recognized its responsibility over the interstate transportation of energy supplies and the need to use Federal eminent domain as early as 1947 when that authority was granted to interstate natural gas pipelines. There are no significant differences between natural gas pipelines and coal pipelines, yet we remain without essential coal pipelines due to lack of congressional action. I urge my colleagues not to let another year be added to the 21 years of waiting for the Congress to adopt a reasonable and necessary coal pipeline bill. The time for action is long overdue.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, before we get into the business of passing legislation to facilitate construction of coal slurry pipelines, I want to reiterate the statement made in testimony before the House Public Works and Transportation Subcommittee on April 19, 1983, by Carol E. Dinkins, the Assistant Attorney General, Land and Natural Resources Division:

> . . . There is no question that it is within Congress' commerce clause power to authorize a State law that would otherwise constitute an impermissible burden on interstate commerce.

Dinkins went on to add that:

> . . . I must reemphasize that of course, whether the courts will ultimately determine that the expressed intent is sufficiently clear to immunize State water laws affecting coal slurries from commerce clause scrutiny is to a certain extent speculative. . . .

Western members should heed this warning and know that in spite of extraordinary efforts to characterize this bill as one protecting the sovereignty of State water laws, this legislation cannot be taken as a guarantee of those States rights.

To the extent that the commerce clause is granted to States only with respect to coal slurry, and embedded in legislation to facilitate construction of a coal pipeline, it seems obvious that in a future contest over water rights those States with pipelines will have a clear advantage over those without. Let me say that again. States who contest the loss of water in a shared pool or seek an otherwise reasonable change in allocations of that pool have only existing mechanisms of redress. However, States drawing from that shared pool for the pipeline will be armed with the full force of compelling national interest and beneficial use, the grant of Federal eminent domain, together with the congressionally delegated commerce clause power. Is there any doubt who would win and who would lose.

Mr. Chairman, you may ask how important is winning and losing, after all it is only water. Well let me expand on some of the facts about water in the West—facts with which citizens of Colorado are intimately familiar. Mr. Chairman, of the total supply of water in this whole world, 97 percent is salt water. Of the remaining water, 75 percent is stored as ice caps in the polar regions. Only 0.05 percent of the total water supply is fresh water in streams and lakes. From that amount, within the United States, 73 percent of the stream flow is claimed by States east of a north/south line drawn through the Kansas/Missouri border, and 12.7 percent is claimed by the Pacific Northwest. That leaves 14.2 percent to be shared by 14 Western States which includes over one-half of the Nation's land area. Colorado sits at the apex of this scarce western water supply.

Mr. Chairman, since the time when Zebulon Pike moved up the Arkansas River into what is now Colorado, managing scarce water has been a way of life, a means of survival, and the only hope for future prosperity in the region. So far, we have done pretty well in delicately balancing the competing demands of agriculture, industry, recreation, residential and neighboring and downstream States. Lately, the job has gotten much more difficult because our population has enjoyed remarkable growth. But with the same determination with which Zebulon Pike reached the Rockies, Colorado will continue to balance its water demands, however, passage of this bill would seriously jeopardize our chances of continued success, by asking the citizens of Colorado to win the war of water conservation with a slurry pipe tied around their necks.

Mr. Chairman, when the dust settles, this simple fact remains—that, any water which enter that 38-inch pipe to slurry coal to other parts of the country is water that is gone forever. It cannot be used to irrigate farms or ranches, it cannot be used to supply a promising high tech industry in the front range area, and it cannot be used in the taps of the growing number of homes in my State. Most importantly, it is gone, with or without the consent of citizens of Colorado, whether intentional or not, the water language in this bill guarantees only one thing and that is that the pipelines will get the water it wants.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VENTO

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VENTO: In section 3 of the amendment in the nature of a substitute—

(1) strike out "and" at the end of paragraph(6);

(2) strike out the period at the end of paragraph (7) and insert in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) insert after paragraph (7) the following:

(8) no State shall sell or otherwise transfer or permit the sale or transfer, for use in a coal pipeline for which a certificate is issued under section 10 of this Act outside of such State, water which is taken from any river or other body of surface water which is located in or which passes through more than one State or from any aquifer or other body of ground water which underlies more than one State unless—

(A) there is in effect an interstate compact (i) among the diverting State and each State located downstream of such diversion and prior to the confluence with a river or stream of which it is a tributary, or (ii) among the States under which aquifer or other body of ground water lies, which governs such sale or transfer, and

(B) such sale or transfer is in accordance with the terms of such compact.

Mr. VENTO (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that is before the body at this point deals with the compact between the States in terms of the approval of the water to be utilized in the coal slurry pipelines.

Mr. Chairman, I might add to the Members that this amendment was offered in the Interior Committee. It was also offered in the Public Works Committee. Even though spirited arguments were made, it was not successful in committee.

I bring this to the body because I think it is a terribly important issue with respect to coal slurry lines and the utilization of water.

They will use vast amounts of water, billions of gallons of water from scattered scarce areas in the Western part of the United States. What this amendment does of course is it tries to attain agreement among the various States, whether it involves multistate surface waters or aquifers with regard to that water used in a coal pipeline.

Now, I might say that this does not solve all the problems with respect to water. Indeed, the coal slurry pipelines hold over other water users the fear, the expectation and the real possibility that they will drain the life blood from America's natural agricultural resources. After all, the areas that the water needs to come from are those key areas, those arid areas that we have spent hundreds of billions of dollars, attempting to spend money on reclamation and other projects to try to make them economically viable, to do even marginal raising of crops and cattle and so forth in those areas. So, I know the interest and the emotions that exist with regard to this issue.

Now, indeed it was pointed out here by my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Interior Committee did address this particular question and said, that the type of amendment that you are offering dealing with compacts really gets down to basic water policy, and indeed Congress at some point should attempt to address that particular problem. But the fact is not now.

The truth of the matter is of course this bill does a very great deal in terms of water policy with regards to what is happening. But it does it in a one-sided, in a lop-sided manner. It does it in a way that will facilitate the construction and utilization with regards to water.

To those that are familiar with the bill of course they recognize that H.R. 1010 grants to the State of origin of the water all the Congress power under the commerce clause. This is the clause that deals with the interstate relationship in terms of transportation. And that is our constitutional power, to legislate with respect to the use of water for coal slurry pipelines. This legislation gives that power even when such a State's action, and this is in the bill, would otherwise constitute an impermissible burden on interstate commerce, they can still be granted that particular power. States contesting that loss of their shared water to the diversion occurring in another State would be forced to rely on the existing mechanisms. That is you can go to court, you can go to the legislature. But you do not have the legal standing that the Constitution has granted.

Now, what this amendment attempts to do is to try and suggest that you can of course use the multistate water, but only if there is an interstate compact or agreement, otherwise you have to create such a compact. If that water is upstream or downstream, if it is surface water, acquifer, you must obtain the agreement of States affected. That is a new water policy. But it is very necessary.

The fact of the matter is that the courts have not adjudicated all the rights and responsibilities on the allocation of water between the various States or water basins or aquifers. To make that particular assumption is to show that we just have not had that type of determination with regard to all of the water interests that exist.

Therefore, when we give the commerce clause here we are interfering, we are taking away, we are stripping the courts of that particular power and the States then will be denied the right or the opportunity to represent the best interests of their States, those of agriculture, those that need it, the other competing interests.

We are saying that if you can attain an agreement, whether or not it is the best agreement I guess is going to be left to the States. I happen to think water for coal slurry is not a good use, not a good agreement.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY).

Mr. MOODY. Is it not true, would the gentleman not agree, that the bill says "Nothing in this act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the water," et cetera, and does that not mean that this is contrary to what you say this is, which is all of the rights under the commerce clause?

This is a very limited right of the commerce clause; is that not correct?

Mr. VENTO. If I can reclaim my time. First, apportioned, is modified. "Apportioned share" assumes that there has been a court determination; and, second of all, if you look back, I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. MOODY, to paragraphs 2 and 3, those supersede and they dictate with regard to what happens in paragraph 2 or 3 on paragraph 4. "Pursuant to the commerce clause * * * the Congress hereby expressly delegates to the States the power to establish and exercise in State law, whether now in existence or hereafter enacted, terms or conditions * * * for the reservation, appropriation, use, export, or diversion of," that water.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. VENTO was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. VENTO. Clause 3 says "nothing in this act or any amendment made by this act shall impair the validity of any provision of State law."

So the point is this is a one-sided bargain. This preserves the rights of that State of origin, grants them through the commerce clause extraordinary powers to accomplish what it wants to do, much at the expense of the other States that are affected by it. In fact, this will override a compact, an agreement that may be in existence. This gives the States the ability to break that compact and that is why it is very frustrating.

I know what the intention of the authors of the amendment were, but the effect of the amendment is what is important. It is a situation where the whereases do not match up with the now therefores.

With regard to this amendment, that is what the problem is. This destroys and eliminates States' rights. The amendment that I am offering in conjunction with the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) and in conjunction with the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR), and others, gives us the opportunity to have coordination and cooperation with respect to particular minute issues regarding water rights.

It does not solve all of the water problems but it solves some created by the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Montana, Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I commend the gentleman for attempting to solve what is a major water difficulty with regard to States' rights over their own water.

We had been assured earlier that the States' rights were protected and yet, as I read the gentleman's amendment, he is trying to patch up this coal slurry bill to assure that they are protected.

Let me ask the gentleman: Does your amendment in any way alter, change, or amend what has been known as the Cheney language?

The gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY) had written section 3, parts 1 and 2. Do you amend those in any way?

Mr. VENTO. No, we do not. We add a clause at the end of the section. This clause would be a consideration based on that.

I think there are some major defects in the Cheney language. I do not know quite how to get at them because the authors are in favor of the commerce clause extension and they are in favor of the other changes in there and we are just trying to deal with one facet in it.

It is inadequate, in a way, but I think it deals with a fundamental flaw in terms of the compacts.

You are going to have a big water problem with coal slurry pipelines and nobody is going to be able to eliminate that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. If the gentleman will yield further, you are saying your amendment then does not solve, to your satisfaction, the water difficulty inherent in this bill?

Mr. VENTO. No, it does not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. If the gentleman will yield further, section 3(1) grants without exception and without question, it grants to individual States the exclusive power to authorize for sale water to coal slurry companies.

Mr. VENTO. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. How do you alter that? How do you stop Montana and upstream States from selling that water?

Mr. VENTO. The legislation permits them to break compacts, and also delegates, not just—get this—not just the authority in terms of what is the existing law but any future law any legislature might write which then has precedence over any law or any compact they agree to.

So, in other words, it encourages State legislatures to go out and break compacts and break the type of cooperation and coordination which I think is fundamentally important if we are going to deal with the type water problems that we have in this Nation. We had better face up to it in this particular measure and that is what we are doing.

It may not be the intent, but it certainly is the fact that that is the power you are giving in this legislation.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I commend the gentleman for his amendment and his statement.

I just wanted to ask the gentleman one question. If in fact the coal slurry bill passes without the gentleman's amendment, is it not true that we will give to the States that wish to sell the water a great deal of authority, and it will be up to those States in the downstream areas without compacts to persuade the States that have these powers being granted to them to enter into some kind of an agreement voluntarily?

It does not mandate that there is any kind of control of the use of that water upstream; is that not the case?

Mr. VENTO. I think that is exactly right. You are just precluding any type of cooperation and you are taking away any legal arguments that that State might have with regard to multistate aquifers or surface waters. If this language were simply neutral with regard to that, and that is what we are trying to do, and we have big problems with regard to water, and all we are trying to do is to neutralize that to permit the other States around that have rights with regard to aquifers, or with regard to surface water, to have some voice.

After all, South Dakota is going ahead. They have signed contracts for billions of acre feet of water to be removed from that State and to be sold.

I come from a water rich State and certainly we would stand to gain. But obviously any water we shipped out of Minnesota would affect many, many States around us.

I think that is wrong. I think it is fundamentally the wrong way to go with regard to what this language has in it.

I ask for a vote to preserve this small bit of States' rights.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think while we talk about this water amendment it is very, very important that we understand and put into proper perspective how much water we are talking about. Some people would have us believe that we are talking about perhaps diverting the Mississippi River to build a coal slurry pipeline or perhaps we are going to dam up Niagara Falls and use all of the water coming through the falls to build a coal slurry pipeline.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The estimates of one of the largest existing coal slurry pipelines that is being talked about being built, the ETSI line, do my colleagues know how much they are talking about using in terms of water to operate their entire line? They are talking about an amount of 20,000 acre-feet of water.

Let me tell you how much that is. That is equal to about 10 percent of the amount of water that annually evaporates from the reservoir from which ETSI's water will be taken. We are talking about them only using 10 percent of the amount of water that annually evaporates into the air from that reservior.

We are not talking about using all of the water in the Atlantic Ocean or half of the water in the Pacific Ocean or half of the water in the Mississippi River.

The biggest line is only going to use 10 percent of an amount of water that annually evaporates into the air from one reservoir.

How have we addressed the problem of water? I think very, very carefully. Everybody has been involved in this.

The gentleman's amendment mandates, No. 1, that States cannot allow any water to be sold unless they have a mandatory compact. If you vote for this amendment you are telling every State that they must join an interstate water compact.

The States can do that today. If five States agree on how they are going to handle the water in their area, they can form a compact. That compact can say we will never sell water for the construction of a coal slurry pipeline and that compact will be valid. If is valid today. It is valid after this legislation is passed.

But how could anyone in Washington tell the States we are going to make you form an interstate compact?

Suppose your State does not want to join a compact because they do not like the terms and conditions? Are you willing to say we are going to make you do it anyway?

Interstate compacts are valid now without the legislation, but they are voluntary, as they should be.

The gentleman's amendment also does something which I think is really going too far. It talks about not only if the water is coming from a State or from an underground aquifer from a State, that they would have to join an interstate compact, but it says if it even passes through that State that that State would be mandated to join an interstate compact.

□ 1350

Now let us consider the Mississippi River that goes from the Gulf of Mexico all the way up north. How many States does the water pass through? Twelve, fifteen? Are you willing to say you are going to have to make every one of those States forcibly join an interstate compact even though they do not want to? This is absolutely a killer amendment. It would absolutely kill it. We might as well pack it up and go home.

No one can say, "I am going to support this amendment" and still say they are for coal slurry. It is just as clear as that.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I cannot. I do not have much time.

It is all right to say to the States to form a compact, an interstate compact, if they want to, it is fine, we applaud it. If it says you cannot use the water for coal slurry pipelines, that is fine, I applaud that. But Congress should not be mandating, forcing the State to do something perhaps that the State does not want to do.

How about the States that thinks it is appropriate and proper?

Do not let anyone kid you. This amendment really devastates the bill. We might as well not have a bill if you try to force every State that the water might even trickle through, and that is how it could be read, to mandate them into forming an interstate compact.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, of course it is our intention to deal with diversion of water downstream or upsteam prior to the confluence with the river's steam or tributary. It is my interpretation that that language would not have the effect that the gentleman has alluded to. So it would not involve that.

Furthermore, the concern is that of course there would not be a formation of a compact; you are only dealing with certified use for the construction of the pipeline according to the prescription in this bill and then only where a multistate water source is involved. It only affects the State in terms of multistate surface water or aquifer. If the water is just within one State, it would not have a need for the compact.

Mr. BREAUX. I would take my time back.

The main point is, I would say to the gentleman, is that the water would only have to pass through a State under his amendment to require that State to have to form an interstate compact. Even if they do not want to.

Suppose you have nine States that are willing sellers.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman (Mr. BREAUX) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BREAUX was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BREAUX. If you had 10 States that the water passes through and 9 of them control 99.9 percent of the water and you have only one State that it might trickle through. The nine States could agree that this is in their interest to go ahead and form this compact and sell the water. If one State could say no, the whole thing could fall apart under the gentleman's amendment.

I am saying that it is fine to allow the States to agree to something voluntarily. I do not think we in Washington should be telling them that they have to.

That is not the way to do it.

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McNULTY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In the gentleman's opinion, under current law, what power do States have to restrict the export of water?

Mr. BREAUX. Under the recent Supreme Court decisions in the absence of this bill they could not restrict the sale of water under the interstate commerce clause. This bill specifically tells any State that if they want to they can say, "No, none of our water will be used for a coal slurry pipeline," under this bill. Without this bill they cannot do it.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to join with my colleague from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) in opposing this amendment. I think it is important for everyone to understand what is at stake with the Vento amendment, and I certainly share service on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO). He is an honorable man. He offered this amendment in committee or a similar version of it. It was debated in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and, of course, was defeated.

Everybody should understand that this is at the heart of this particular piece of legislation and that in fact what has been suggested here, should it be adopted, will be viewed as a killer amendment. If the Vento amendment passes, coal slurry pipeline legislation, I believe, is dead for this session of Congress.

I think it is also important for everyone to understand, especially those of us from the West who are concerned and whose districts might be directly affected by slurry legislation, to understand that the Vento amendment goes against the grain at what is attempted in the bill as it was brought to the floor.

Specifically, the water issue, as it relates to coal slurry pipelines, has always been a question of preserving for the States the right to decide, individually, whether or not they want to see water used in a coal slurry pipeline, the right for the States to decide individually what terms and conditions they might like to impose upon that use.

With respect to my home State of Wyoming, the State legislature and the Governor have granted a slurry pipeline permit to the ETSI Transportation Co., but in doing so they impose terms and conditions upon the export of water for the coal slurry pipeline.

They said that if the use of that water violated or in any way damaged any other water users' rights, the State engineer was authorized to terminate the export of that water.

What the Sporhase decision did, in effect, was to strike down the ability of the State to impose conditions on the use of water.

What the coal slurry pipeline bill, as brought to the floor by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, brought to us by the distinguished gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), H.R. 1010, does is grant to the States the right to assert the congressional intent that the States shall have the right to decide how they use their water.

What the Vento amendment, in effect, would do is to impose a veto by another State upon the use, by the originating State, of its water.

Specifically, the Vento amendment would set up a situation in which my State of Wyoming would not be permitted to decide how to use its share of its water if in fact Minnesota or other States in the Basin covered by his amendment should decide not to go along with that use.

Specifically, it sets an extremely dangerous precedent. The Vento amendment in effect would require States to form interstate compacts and require all States sharing a water source to consent, before any one of the States uses its own share of the water for an interstate coal pipeline.

This would no doubt preclude construction of most coal pipelines. Aside from this deadly effect on the coal slurry industry, the pipeline industry, this amendment would also begin dismantling this country's settled policy on water management and set a very dangerous precedent for other natural resources. If you can in fact require an interstate compact before one State can make a decision to use part of its water for a coal slurry line, the next thing you will be able to do is require an interstate compact before a State can use part of its water for agricultural purposes, for municipal purposes, for recreational purposes, or for any other use that that State deems wise.

Presently each State has the power to allocate the water and to determine beneficial uses of water within its borders without interference from any other State.

A State, believing that its right to a share of interstate water is being invaded by another State, may invoke the long-standing authority of the U.S. Supreme Court which will guarantee each State an equitable share of the disputed water resource.

An interstate compact is one established alternative mechanism for States to divide among themselves the water source which they all share. It is a voluntary mechanism which constitutes an agreement on the size of each State's slice of the water pie. A compact does not direct a State as to how or when to eat their respective slice.

In other words, Colorado would not presume to tell Arizona what crops to irrigate, whether water could be used for agricultural or municipal or industrial purposes.

The Vento amendment would empower each signatory State in effect to dictate the water use of each other signatory State with respect to coal pipelines, since it contains a sister State signoff requirement.

Thus in the case of coal slurry lines the Congress would be saying that a State does not have the authority to decide how to use its own water since the State clearly does not have the power to use another State's water.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman (Mr. CHENEY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CHENEY was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. CHENEY. By way of conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize once again that the language in the bill, H.R. 1010, as brought to the floor, makes it very clear that the States shall have authority to decide how to use their share of the water, that the Vento amendment interferes with that, that the Vento amendment specifically would dictate a requirement, mandate a requirement that there will be interstate compacts before a State can decide to use its portion of water in a coal slurry pipeline.

It is an extremely dangerous precedent. If you believe in the principle of States rights where water policy is concerned, then my colleagues ought to work to and vote to defeat the Vento amendment.

□ 1400

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman has made an important statement and along with the gentleman from Utah (Mr. MARRIOTT) and the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN), and the committee, has done much to nail down this water problem.

I think there is an inconsistency here and I challenge the opposers of the coal slurry pipeline to cite me an instance where anything like this has ever been done before, where you say to any 1 of 11 States, as the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) pointed out, "You can veto your sister States' use of their own water."

We come down the line and say on pages 4 and 5 of the bill, States rights are protected, State law prevails on every occasion, State procedure must be used. In fact we are the only amendment kicking around that enlarges States rights.

They come in and say, "Oh, what we need to do here is have the long arm of the Federal Government march in and say, 'None of you can use any of your water or dedicate it to the pipeline unless a compact has been signed.'"

These compacts may take 50 years to get worked out.

I asked my staff if we could find any other instance where a compact is required before a State can use its own water, and I cannot find one. I challenge the other side to show us where this might have occurred previously.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

And it seems to me that this is going in exactly the opposite direction that we have always tried to go in and that is, to allow the States to get into their own compacts, if they want to. If they do not want to, that is perfectly all right. They have all agreed to do that. But we have always tried to keep the Federal Government out of how we allocate our water.

The gentleman has done an excellent job of explaining why this amendment should not be adopted. And let me just make the point that those of us who believe that the States ought to have their own regulations, as far as water is concerned, without the Federal Government coming in and dictating those conditions, I think that those of us who believe that way would naturally oppose this amendment.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the chairman deserves an answer to his question. And the first answer I would have is that there are many of us who dispute very much the statement that it is their own water.

Many of us believe that water that comes from Montana flows down through South Dakota and on to other States does not belong to South Dakota or any other individual State along that line.

We do believe that since it is jointly used it should be a joint resource and I would challenge the chairman back to tell us some other type of a product or anything in which it would flow from one State to another down through a whole series of States wherein he would agree that there is not a compact existing.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. And I rise in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I was chairman for many years in California of our State Cooperation Commission. My job was to negotiate interstate compacts on a voluntary basis with all of the other States on a variety of issues. But requiring interstate compacts before water can be used for coal slurry pipelines is actually a limitation on State regulation and the control of its own water resources that is unprecedented.

Such a provision would allow one State to hold another State hostage and effectively prevent the second State from issuing a permit to a slurry pipeline by just refusing to enter into a compact. Such a result would actually be a disincentive to compacts. And I think that the amendment was pretty accurately labeled a few moments ago when somebody called it the "killer amendment."

This amendment if adopted would represent a provocative Federal act by requiring such a compact and it tramples over the rights of States to regulate their own water resources; I naturally oppose this amendment.

Now I do have some concerns about water in California. We have a number of large rivers solely within our State, the Eel, Sacramento, San Joaquin, many, many of them. But we have a large number of other rivers that either run through or run along the edge of our State, such as the Colorado River which originates up in the Rockies and goes on down into the Gulf of Lower California.

So I wanted to know how this language, which originated in our Interior Committee impacts upon California. So the Association of California Water Agencies who are the experts in this area were contacted. And this is their answer.

They said:

H.R. 3857, The Coal Pipeline Act of 1983, is scheduled for House action this week. During the course of Committee review of this legislation, many questions were raised as to the adequacy of the language protecting the rights of States to manage their own water resources and whether States in the water short West would lose control over this essential resource.

The Association of California Water Agencies has studied the language in H.R. 3857 and feels it is tightly drawn and well crafted. We believe that it carefully covers the issues raised in the recent Sporhase case and that the California water rights process is fully protected.

And that is signed by Robert Will for the Association of California Water Agencies.

If this bill protects the water rights for California, I would think that my colleagues who have similar situations in their States would find that their water rights would be similarly protected.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Vento amendment.

Mr. Chairman, supporters of this unwise coal slurry legislation would have us believe that the amendment being offered is a "radical departure from the American system of water law".

Nothing could be further from the truth, and no statement could be more misleading concerning the real nature of the shared water debate.

My colleagues, I would ask you to focus on two points. First, if anything is a radical departure from American law, it is the bill's current language which—in an unprecedented fashion—purports to delegate to a State of origin all of Congress power under the Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution. It is the bill's water language, not the amendment, which is an unprecedented departure from traditional practices.

Second, the amendment which is being offered is one intentionally built around perhaps the most successful of the traditional approaches to resolving multi-State water problems. Interstate compacts are firmly established as vital and effective tools for meeting the complex and diverse needs of the States. Their use dates back to the British North American Colonies prior to the American Revolution. Since the close of World War II, there has been rapid growth in the use of the compact device, with more being negotiated in two recent decades than during the preceding 200-plus years.

I believe that resorting to the device of an interstate compact to resolve multi-State, water-related coal slurry conflicts is clearly appropriate and desirable. And I am not by any means the only one who feels this way. In a recent article written by Mr. F. Henry Habicht II, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Land and Natural Resources Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, the following thoughts were offered concerning State primacy in interstate water-allocation disputes:

Cooperative interstate efforts, undertaken consistently with the rule of state primacy, must be explored when more than one state asserts an interest in a particular water system. Interstate compacts, which strive to reach a consensual, equitable balancing of sovereign interests, appear to be sound responses to such situations. To be sure, the development of compacts to address the difficult allocation decisions faced in the West is not easy. It requires hard choices by all concerned. However, in the absence of such compacts, the resolution of allocation disputes is too often left to the vagaries of judicial application of federal common law ("equitable apportionment") in costly litigation or to unilateral federal congressional intervention. The alternative of interstate compacts seems preferable and is consistent with the key principles of state primacy.

The shared water amendment that is being offered this afternoon employs as its basic protective mechanism the formation of an interstate compact of the very type discussed by Mr. Habicht.

Mr. Chairman, interstate compacts have been used repeatedly in past years to solve multi-State, water-related problems. The following is a list of just some of the compacts which have been entered into in years past relating to water resources:

Animas-La Plata Project Compact.
Arkansas River Basin Compact of 1970.
Arkansas River Compact of 1949.
Arkansas River Compact of 1965.
Bear River Compact.
Belle Fourche River Compact.
Big Blue River Compact.
California-Nevada Interstate Compact.
Canadian River Compact.
Colorado River Compact.
Costilla Creek Compact.
Klamath River Compact.
La Plata River Compact.
Pecos River Compact.
Red River Compact.
Republican River Compact.
Rio Grande Interstate Compact.
Sabine River Compact.
Snake River Compact.
South Platte River Compact.
Upper Colorado River Basin Compact.

Upper Niobrara River Compact.
Yellowstone River Compact.
New England Interstate Water Pollution Control Compact.
New Hampshire-Vermont Interstate Sewage and Waste Disposal Facilities Compact.
Ohio River Valley Water Sanitation Compact.
Tri-State Sanitation Compact.
Connecticut River Valley Flood Control Compact.
Delaware River Basin Compact.
Great Lakes Basin Compact.
Merrimack River Food Control Compact.
Potomac Valley Compact.
Susquehanna River Basin Compact.
Thames River Flood Control Compact.
Wheeling Creek Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Compact.

Mr. Chairman, the shared water amendment calling for the formation of interstate compacts to resolve coal-slurry-related water problems is intended to act as an equalizer, to cause the States to deal with each other as equals and to resolve their problems beforehand. I urge that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman in the well for his statement and wish to be associated with it.

Let me point out that there is nothing in this bill, if this amendment is not adopted, that would preclude or protect one State, let us say South Dakota or Wyoming, from siphoning off the entire Missouri River. There is nothing in this bill to protect downstream users at all, including Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and other downstream users.

□ 1410

It has been suggested that in fact this is a precedent. It is a welcome precedent when we have the same situation developing now where one State can dictate what the rest of the river basin will be able to have flowing downstream.

Now, when you take water out of a river basin, like ETSI pipeline is doing, and transfer it completely out of our river basin into another river basin, we do not get any of that moisture back. Not a drop of it comes back, where normally 60 percent of water that is used within a river basin will come back to that basin.

So it is important that the rest of the States in this river basin be heard from. There is no protection except for this type of amendment.

If we are talking about States rights, what more tenable position could you have than to say to the States, "Go out amongst yourselves, without Federal mandates as to what your agreement might be, but agree amongst yourselves. We do not want the arm of the Federal Government coming in here telling you how to do it. You go ahead and do it on your own, you the States involved in the river basin."

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) has expired.

(On request of Mr. CHENEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri just made the statement that there is nothing in the legislation that prohibits a State upstream from selling water or disposing of water that belongs to downstream States.

I would for the record like to quote from page 5. This is section 3, paragraph (4) of the bill:

(4) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the waters of any body of surface or ground water, whether determined by past or future interstate compacts, or by past or future legislative or judicial allocation;

I would emphasize that there is absolutely nothing in this legislation that in any way grants, for example, to the State of South Dakota, the right to sell water that the State of South Dakota does not own.

If Missouri has a problem with South Dakota's action in selling water to the ETSI Interstate Pipeline, then Missouri should go to court and challenge in court South Dakota's action. That is already being done at present. The place to resolve that is in court or by a voluntary interstate compact.

But this provision, this amendment, is not voluntary. It is in fact mandatory.

I want to make it clear again, one more time for the record, there is nothing in this bill that changes the allocation of water among the States. Any statement to the contrary is simply inaccurate.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I appreciate the gentleman's statement as he commented on the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, but it is my understanding that indeed the language of this bill would arm a State with extraordinary powers of the commerce clause of the Constitution, as opposed to the adjacent States or the downstream States, who would only have ordinary powers. That is a complex legal difference but a very important one.

Mr. CHENEY. If the gentleman will yield further, that simply is not true.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Well, maybe we can develop the debate and apprise my friend of what the facts are and what the real truth is.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I serve on both the Interior Committee and the Public Works Committee and have heard countless hours of testimony on the bill. In both committees, many, many hours were spent discussing this and other amendments.

Pardon me if I go over again some of the ground that we have been covering, but I think the water amendment is the single most crucial amendment to this bill and therefore I hope every Member has had the chance to coherently hear the arguments on both sides.

This indeed is the amendment to kill or save the bill. Let us try to summarize some key points:

H.R. 1010 conveys to the State of the waters' origin a power it does not now have—the right under a delegation of the interstate commerce clause, to the ability to stop the water from leaving from that State. It does not give the State the interstate power that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) suggested, because if you look at the language in the bill, it circumscribes the interstate commerce clause delegation again and again and again.

There is something surrealistic about this amendment: It pretends to give a State more power over water when in fact, it would give each State less power, since its desire to use its water for coal pipelines could be vetoed by another State. The bill gives the States more power since the State of origin can prevent its own water from being used for coal pipelines.

A second question, and the key question for many people is: What about the other States that share in that water source, be it the Great Lakes, the Mississippi River, or some particular water aquifer? There is a principle well established in the law called the principle of "equitable allocation," most notably embodied in the "Illinois against Wisconsin" case, in which the U.S. Supreme Court said that every State that shares a body of water has a legal right to its equitable allocation.

The earlier statement in the debate here that nothing in the bill prevents one State from simply draining the Colorado River is true in the narrow sense that there is nothing in the bill. But there are things in law, there are things in case law, which absolutely do prevent it. The principle of equitable allocation means that no State may simply apportion to itself water without respect to the other States rights. Every State has the right to go into court to protect its share. This is extremely crucial.

Regarding interstate water compacts, as has been said before, this amendment would mandate—federally mandate—water compacts. Note that by simply failing to join the compact—either through decision or indecision—the State would have a veto over the ability of every other State sharing a source of water to use any part of that water for coal pipelines.

Do we want to give a State—by simply nonaction—the veto over some other State? I do not think so. That would be a Federal mandate that few of us would welcome. It also gives them the veto, of course, as has been explained earlier, simply by simple, outright veto if it is a member. We give the State a right to veto another State's use of water once it is in that compact.

Earlier a statement was made by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) that this bill runs roughshod over compacts and destroys compact. This is absolutely not accurate. When all else fails, it is sometimes useful to read the actual language in the bill. Section 3, paragraph (3) reads:

(3) nothing in this Act or any amendment made by this Act shall impair the validity of any provision of State law, regulation, or rule of law or of any interstate compact or treaty governing the appropriation, use, export, or diversion of, or other claim of right to water;

This bill does not force compacts, but it recognizes that if they exist, they are valid, and continue to have their force that they were initially intended to have.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. Under the gentleman's understanding of the bill as it now stands, is it the gentleman's understanding that States could join together into interstate compacts that would agree never to sell any water within that compact to build a coal slurry pipeline?

Mr. MOODY. Absolutely.

Mr. BREAUX. They have that authority in the existing bill?

Mr MOODY. That is right. Every State has the ability to achieve what the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) would like to force them to achieve, namely, to join a compact.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Of course, I do respectfully disagree with his interpretation of what the amendment is and the language of the bill, because there are clauses (2) and (3) which, of course, do give that commerce clause power. And the commerce clause is not a one-way street. As the gentleman said, this gives a heck of a lot more power to the State of origin. I think we can agree with that. And then the gentleman says that the States that are affected have the right to go to court, and there is a lot of case law. But I think that my understanding is that case law would be set aside by something we pass here today, and that you have a right to go to court, but that is not a very strong one.

Mr. MOODY. Let me reclaim my time before the gentleman moves to another point.

To answer that point: The bill H.R. 1010 says that "nothing in this act or any amendment made by this act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the waters of any body of surface or ground water," et cetera. So right inside this bill, in fact, a lower section, acknowledges the apportioned-share concept.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VENTO and by unanimous consent, Mr. MOODY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. VENTO. If the gentleman will yield further, I do not want to extend the debate. I think we are having a good debate, and I appreciate the gentleman yielding, but I think the thing is that the apportioned share assumes that that is all spelled out. In many cases, as I indicated to the gentleman, it is indeed not the case that it is spelled out in the type of specificity. And in this case, of course, then, the responsibility or the power, the new power you are giving under the commerce clause, the Congress giving it the commerce clause power, to any law that is passed now or may be passed in the future by that State.

Mr. MOODY. I would reclaim my time. The commerce clause in question grants the State of origin some power that it does not now have. Now, without this bill a State could not prevent water from leaving that State if the water is used in interstate commerce. This bill grants that power for the first time to a State with respect to coal pipelines. That is the new power.

However, that should not be interpreted to say that another State can be forced to have its own water drained away by another State, as the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO) implies. That is a separate issue. The commerce clause does not grant that power to any State. The apportioned-share section of this law clearly acknowledges the equitable-share concept that is firmly established in law. It even writes it in with paragraph (4) of section 3.

□ 1420

Your point has some validity, that if a State does not have an apportioned share already, where does it stand? Then it must go into court and get an apportioned share, but it has every right to do so. That is the crucial point.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I recognize the problem with the Sporhase case, and this tries to remedy that particular problem; in other words, giving the right to the States to say no, but it also gives the States the right to say yes. In other words, if it were only the intention to overcome that, I think it would have been a far simpler problem than what is done. In other words, this goes well beyond that particular relationship and I think to the detriment of the States that share the aquifer or the surface water.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the commerce clause is like a string. You can pull on a string but you cannot push on a string. A State can restrict its loss of its own water; it cannot force anything onto another State that another State does not want.

Through the apportionment share concept, any State has a right to go in to court and insure its equitably apportioned share of water from a common source.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I find myself in the unusual position of being in complete sympathy with what the author of this amendment is attempting to do; however, in the position of believing that it will not accomplish its intended purpose.

We had substantial testimony before our committee from both the Department of Justice, and from a distinguished panel of constitutional lawyers, including Prof. Charles Corker, a professor of constitutional law and water law at the University of Washington Law School, who said that there is no way to protect water in this legislation because it is an irreconcilable conflict.

He said specifically, if coal slurry pipelines are constructed and operated, and later the law of the State of diversion is changed or if later it becomes clear that under the law of that State the pipeline is to be shut down in favor of new uses of water, or in favor of existing uses of water within the States which have natural access to that water, it is most likely in any interpretation that a court will protect the existing uses.

He goes on to say that a right perfected by use is a property right protected by the Constitution. So as well meaning as this language is in an attempt to protect water, what it says is, once the spigot is turned on, there is no assurance in the future that you are going to be able to turn the spigot off. Once you turn the spigot on, and downstream hundreds of thousands of people become dependent upon that particular flow of water and slurry, it is quite probable, as the professor and others on the panel said, that you will not be able to turn the spigot off.

Therefore, this is, while certainly not intended, I believe the effect of this amendment is that it is a lulling amendment. It can lull us into believing that water rights are going to be protected, when in fact they are not going to be protected.

Further, I would point out before I yield to my friends that even if this were to protect water, and I do not really believe it does it, and several constitutional lawyers have testified that it does not do it, even if this amendment were to pass today on this floor, remember who is going to control the conference. It is the advocates of coal slurry pipelines, and this amendment could quite easily be stripped out in the conference and we could find ourselves in the position of having coal slurry pipeline legislation without this water amendment.

So it is for those reasons, while in complete sympathy with what the gentleman is attempting to do, that I come to the conclusion that this amendment should be defeated.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I understand his opposition to this modest amendment. I do suggest that my efforts to remedy what is in this bill make it, in the event this bill passes, at least would give the States surrounding that are affected either on an aquifer or surface water basis some voice. It is a modest amendment.

Mr. SHUSTER. If I may reclaim my time for just a moment, I would certainly want to credit the gentleman with having said in his opening remarks, if I wrote it down accurately, that this amendment does not solve all the water problems. So I do not want to mislead the body into thinking that the gentleman has misrepresented his amendment because he certainly has not. He very clearly has indicated that his amendment does not solve all the water problems.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield further, I would, of course, urge Members to vote for it because I think it does deal with a serious problem. I think there are questions of value, what the priorities on water ought to be. Someone got up and talked about the fact that only 10 percent of the amount would evaporate from a reservoir, but we have to understand that half of the water in our water budget is lost through evapotranspiration, so that half of the water is a very substantial amount.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time to respond to that particular point, when we heard from other speakers that, "Well, much water is not going to be used," the fact is, for every ton of coal moved, a ton of water will be used, and just the four proposed pipelines in the Midwest will drain 126 million tons of water out of the area. That is enough water for 30 percent of the entire population of the State of Wyoming. So we are talking about massive, massive shifts of water in the different regions of the country.

So for these various reasons, I believe that this amendment should be defeated, although I am totally sympathetic with the intent of the gentleman.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman has mentioned my district, I would ask him to yield to me.

Mr. SHUSTER. I would be thrilled to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CHENEY. I thank my friend from Pennsylvania for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would point out that if you take the same amount of coal, say 25 million tons proposed in the ETSI pipeline, and burn it in Wyoming and generate power with it in Wyoming, which is then moved by transmission line out of the State, you use five times as much water as would be consumed processing the same amount of coal through a slurry pipeline. So those of us from Wyoming are eager to find a way to process that coal and minimize the water consumption.

Mr. SHUSTER. I thank the gentleman for that statistic. I must tell the gentleman I am disappointed. I thought he was going to compliment me for supporting his position on this amendment.

Mr. CHENEY. I will compliment the gentleman on that also.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. CRAIG and by unanimous consent, Mr. SHUSTER was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania for not only opposing the well-meaning amendment, but recognizing, as I think many of us do, and especially some westerners, some Western States Representatives that have water but do not have coal and, therefore, are not so rushed in trying to perfect language that in some unique way justifies, at least in their own minds, and maybe with their constituents, that they have protected their water. They fail to recognize that they are really dealing with an irreconciliable issue.

You cannot, when you establish a national interest, as this legislation attempts to do, and that that national interest then becomes perfected into law, can you in any way create some kind of unique language that is going to protect a State, a Western State in this case, as it relates to the water. I think that all sides are struggling to do that, and I have to question at this time, as I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania does, which version of the perfecting language are we trying to deal with. Is it version 1, 2, 3, or 4, or in fact are we trying to mix in a rather ill-focused way two very distinctly different kinds of issues. The issue of water and the importance of water as it relates to all States, and the problem we have in dealing with it in the very complicated language that is always involved with water.

Another issue that we are trying to express is a national issue of great importance to all of the country, and that is the movement of coal in a rather inexpensive way for the purpose of generating power.

When we intermingle those two issues and we establish a national interest on what is a State prerogative, then I question if there is any law current on the books that cannot be effectively contested, no matter how well we think we can perfect it at this moment.

I think the gentleman has brought that out so very clearly, whether it is the well-meaning intent of the Vento amendment or whether my colleague from Wyoming, in trying to craft language that says we have for once and for all shoved aside Sporhase and we are now protecting water. I really question that and I think we all ought to very clearly search that in our minds.

Once we have established a national interest and a national purpose, I suspect that a State of origin, even in a shared relationship, begins to lose its ability to control its destiny and the destiny of its water when you have established that kind of interest, and I think that is the basis of the argument we are dealing with here, and I congratulate the gentleman on that argument.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is absolutely right. Once you turn the spigot on, you have no assurance that you can turn the spigot off, and that is why we should not be lulled into thinking that there is language that can protect water rights in this legislation.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this interesting debate, I find, brings me to some reasonable conclusions.

I have no doubt in my mind that the drafters of the legislation wanted to protect water rights. They wanted to protect water rights in all of the bills and during all the hearings over all the years we have had this issue before us. I think they have made an honest effort to do that.

Let us take a look at it. I cannot help but observe that my friend, the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY), said that this is a killer amendment. I have got to conclude that my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SHUSTER), is accurate. There is no killer amendment to this bill. Three-fourths of the House conferees will proponents of coal slurry pipelines. They only want one thing, and that is a right of eminent domain across the property of individuals in this country, and whatever else may be adopted by this House or may not be adopted does not matter a hill of beans; they will take care of it in conference.

Well, what about the water language? Well, the Members know that we had this bill up a few years ago. It was defeated by 85 votes—rightly. It should have been, and rightly it should be defeated again today. We had water language in that bill, and I quote from what my friend, the gentleman from Arizona, the chairman of the committee said then:

> Along with other proponents of this bill, I maintained throughout that any State should have the right to decide whether a drop of its water is used for moving coal, and I believe we have written that protection in the bill. It can no longer be argued that western water is endangered by this piece of legislation.

He believed that. But that was entirely different language than the language we have today. He thought that would protect them, but they must have found out it did not. In their committee report on H.R. 1010—and that is not what is before us, I want to point out—they say this:

> The Committee also notes the substantial concern expressed by Members of Congress and others about the possible effects the broad authority delegated to States to control water for coal pipelines may have on the water resources of other states not the origin of such water. The Committee believes that concerns over allocation of interstate waters, such as certain groundwater aquifers, are understandable and it believes these concerns should receive attention from Congress in the future, as circumstances require. Section 207(c) is specifically designed to address the issue of allocation of interstate waters in a manner consistent with the approach traditionally followed by Congress and the States.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that that is the language that appears in their committee report. They say, "We don't have the answer in there."

Then what do we have before us today? We have H.R. 3857 before us, a substitute as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the rule, and all the testimony we had was on the language that is in H.R. 1010.

Is the language in H.R. 3857 the same as the language in H.R. 1010, the bill on which we had testimony? No; it is materially different.

So I say to the Members that the gentleman's answer is correct. They cannot come up with water language to protect the people, and they have not been able to do that over the years. It does not make any difference how Members vote on this amendment, we will not solve the problem.

We have a water bill coming up that has been reported out of committee. Maybe by the time we take if up they can come up with an answer, but I doubt it.

I think the learned gentleman who was quoted by my friend, the gentleman for Pennsylvania, is probably accurate. I think it is an irresolvable problem.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, let me congratulate the gentleman on that observation. That, of course, has been my frustration in the whole debate as it took place in the committee on which I serve, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

We have to ask ourselves, and everybody on this floor who is going to be voting on this amendment or voting on this legislation, which version are we dealing with?

We have heard year after year the argument that we could not pass legislation dealing with coal slurry unless this specific water language was in the bill; without that, without the properly dotted i's and the crossed t's it simply would not protect western water.

Yet the language we are dealing with today is historically different. It goes off in a new direction, and we are being told and asked to believe that in every way western water or any water, State water or States rights to their water, is going to be protected.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is absolutely correct, and we have to ask, what day of the week is it, and what version of the law are we dealing with?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I think that is right. We had this language in 1978, and they said that protects it; we had this language in H.R. 1010, and they said that protects it; we have this language before us in this bill today, and they say that protects it. I do not know, but I doubt that any of it protects it.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I just want to thank the gentleman for his statement. I think he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania have pointed out some major defects with water problems.

I would just point out that the Vento amendment, developed with others, really only tried to remedy it and tries to do it maybe in a way that the gentleman does not understand. But I think the aspect the gentleman addresses in terms of trying to gain cooperation here if this bill should pass is an important aspect, so I urge the Members to consider that.

Surely this is not a killer amendment. This bill has problems beyond that, and I do not think we have resolved all the water problems. Frankly, that rests with the authors.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I was looking at the 1978 language to which the gentleman referred, and with respect to which the chairman made comments, and I think that language is interesting.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VENTO, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SNYDER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, that language from 1978 says:

> The applicant has any and all permits or authorization for use of any surface water or underground water required by the state or states having jurisdiction over the water to be used or have a valid legal interest in the underground water used . . . .

So what I am saying is that this language goes much further in terms of protection of water than what we have. I think we have a problem with the Sporhase decision. I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming in the committee solves it, and I tried in a modest way to provide for some cooperation.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, before we begin more serious discussion of this water issue, I have two minor points that I think are important to raise. One is that I did a little homework just a few minutes ago and discovered how many Members from Texas happen to like this particular bill. I am strongly opposed to it.

So I did some homework and found section 111.0192 of the State of Texas Code under "Limitations of Power of Eminent Domain," and I discovered the following sentence which I find to be kind of humorous. It says,

No Texas water from any source shall be used in connection with the transportation, maintenance or operation of coal slurry pipelines (except water used for drinking, toilet, bath, or other personal uses at pumping stations—

Note that at the pumping stations pumping other people's water into the State of Texas—

Within the State of Texas • • •

And then there is a little paragraph that says:

Unless the Texas Water Commissioner shall determine after public hearings that the use will not be detrimental to the water supply of the area from which the water is sought to be extracted.

That is the very thing that we are trying to ask for in this water amendment.

Second, I point out that in careful search and in asking questions of both sides, I have asked the question, Who monitors how much coal and how much water goes into the slurry process? We are told that it is a ton of water for a ton of coal to make the slurry process work efficiently.

Suppose they do not put any coal in. Are we not really here today giving national eminent domain to a process of redistribution of not just coal but the possibility of redistribution of water without real regard from the Federal point of view as to where the water is going?

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. Let me get a little more serious here, and I will get to yielding in just a few seconds.

It seems to me that the State of Texas that is going to receive some benefit ought to change the State law in order that they might have a more equitable process of sharing their water as well. The States that are concerned about this water amendment simply want the right or protection.

We give national eminent domain, and we give that process to those States that are the State of origin, those that have the water, and then we say to any affected States in the downstream or upstream area, "If you can voluntarily get the attention of those States upstream who are using your resources, then maybe something can be worked out."

Mr. Chairman, I think the Vento amendment is a critical amendment and one that ought to be passed by this House.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT and Mr. VENTO to protect the rights of all States affected by diversion of water for use in a coal pipeline. The amendment deals with what I believe to be the most serious omission in a seriously flawed piece of legislation.

As we have examined coal pipeline legislation over the years that I have served on the Public Works and Transportation Committee, the water issue has emerged as probably the single most important and controversial concern related to this legislation. For those of my colleagues who are unfamiliar with the largely untested technology of coal slurry, the process involves the use of a ton of water for every ton of coal shipped in this massive operation. Moreover, many of the pipelines currently planned would originate in the dry Western States and deposit wastewater in Southern and Eastern States already plagued with water pollution problems. In a region where competition for water supply is already fierce, the major western rivers and aquifers would be tapped for another new use, while disposal of water laden with coal dust and chemical solvents would present another burden for communities at a pipeline's receiving end.

The water rights language contained in the bill before us represents the first attempt by supporters of the coal pipeline bill to deal with the serious water issues raised by this legislation. However, the new water language contained in the bill is inadequate and misguided. Specifically, the language of the bill attempts to waive the interstate commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution and grant sweeping powers to individual States which might choose to sell or divert water to pipeline developers. Lacking from the bill is any form of protection for those affected downstream States which have been pleading with the courts and Congress for adequate safeguards should the coal slurry bill become law.

This is not a hypothetical problem but rather the most serious issue confronting development of the largest coal pipeline currently being pursued—the ETSI line from Wyoming to Arkansas and Louisiana. The State of South Dakota has already agreed to sell 50,000 acre-feet of water annually for use in the ETSI pipeline at a total price of $1.4 billion. The water would come from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' Oahe project on the Missouri River. Members of Congress from the downstream States in the Missouri River Basin—Iowa, Nebraska, and Missouri—appeared before the Public Works Committee during hearings on this bill arguing that the upstream States like South Dakota will sell this water in total disregard to the anxieties and needs of worried farmers and consumers in other States.

The problem goes beyond the Missouri River situation, however. The Chairman of the Great Lakes Commission wrote to the members of the Public Works Committee in June stating that the "provisions of the coal slurry pipeline bill are inadequate to protect Great Lakes States riparian rights to Great Lakes water." In fact, the bill would threaten the water rights and water supply of any State affected by diversion of water for a coal pipeline where an agreement governing water allocation is not in effect. The way to deal with the water supply problem is clear. Interstate compacts are the traditional means of governing allocation of water resources shared by several States. The bill before us recognizes the value of such compacts by explicitly protecting those compacts currently in effect. What the Hammerschmidt amendment would do is to simply insure that all States affected by a diversion of water for pipeline use would be members of a compact and would agree to the terms of allocation of water.

Opponents of this amendment have argued that interstate compacts have traditionally come about through voluntary arrangements made by the States involved rather than through requirements of the Federal Government. Indeed, there would be no need to require such compacts now if we were not requiring in this very legislation that States accept Federal eminent domain for coal pipelines. If Federal eminent domain is to be acceptable and fair, then certain minimum protections of the rights of affected States must also be present in this bill. Advocates of coal slurry should not be allowed to trample States' rights on the one hand, then turn around and argue that a States' rights doctrine precludes a Federal requirement for interstate compacts.

In conclusion, I would ask that supporters of this bill face squarely their responsibility to insure that States do not enter into destructive competition over our most vital resource as a result of development of coal pipelines. If this amendment fails, we will not only see a temptation to waste vital water resources, we will also see open conflicts between our States for the potentially enormous prices coal slurry developers must pay for water. Under the Hammerschmidt amendment all States affected by a diversion of water for pipeline use would be members of a compact and would have to agree to fair allocations of water. The States themselves—not Congress or the pipeline developer—would decide how to share their common resources.

I urge adoption of the Hammerschmidt amendment.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would make the point that there is a map out in the Speaker's lobby which shows what the flows of water would be should these pipelines be built, and it shows how the waters will be diverted from many portions of our country into other portions of the country. I would commend it to my colleagues if they want to see what the water impact would be.

□ 1440

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for his comment. I also thank the gentleman for the map, because in this past year with the great droughts we have had there may be some interest on the part of some States for picking up this slurry process, to slurry water for the direct purpose.

Suppose a contract is ended and they have no more coal to slurry? They may begin to think of other uses for that water.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO). I think it is clearly an important amendment. As we have examined coal pipeline legislation over the years, as long as I have served on the Public Works and Transportation Committee, the water issue has emerged as probably the single most important and most controversial concern related to this legislation. For those of my colleagues who are unfamiliar with the largely untested technology of coal slurry, I have to admit that it takes an awful lot of water to pass a large quantity of coal. In a region where competition for water supply is already fierce, the major western rivers and aquifers would be tapped for another new use, while disposal of water laden with coal dust and chemical solvents would present another burden for communities at the pipeline's receiving end.

The water rights language contained in the bill before us represents, I believe, the first attempt by supporters of the coal pipeline bill to deal with the serious water issues raised by this legislation; however, the new water language contained in the bill is inadequate and misguided. Specifically, the language of the bill attempts to waive the interstate commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution and grants sweeping powers to individual States which might choose to sell or divert water to pipeline developers.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. EDGAR was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to listen carefully to this debate. It is an important debate. We have heard about the problems that the railroads believe they will be facing. We have heard the proponents of the legislation talk about competition. Both sides have argued for the consumer.

I want to take a very strong stand on behalf of the Nation's water rights. I think it is an important question that people are not focusing on. I think it is a question of equity. It is a question of a natural resource that is being diverted for a new purpose and I urge my colleagues to strongly support the Vento amendment.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. I want to thank him for his leadership in terms of this area. He has been invaluable in terms of the help that he has provided, as well as the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT) with respect to the shared-water amendment.

I think it is very important that we recognize that under the shared-water amendment that whether or not we are going to give legal legislative rights to certain groups, the State of Oregon where the water comes from, and knock out the pins, knock the legs from under them, pull the rug out from other States that might be affected.

I think we are delivering this problem up here today in terms of this bill because it does the transport on an interstate basis of water, as the gentleman has pointed out. Obviously, each State, such as Texas and other States, try to jealously—I think perhaps appropriately—guard their water rights—for what? For human consumption, for agricultural uses, for industrial uses and for various processes; but this is a new use and we are talking about taking that water out of areas that are very arid in the midst really of the worst drought that we have had in many years. Passing legislation that will set a precedent will indeed override and underpin perhaps a bad decision by the Supreme Court; so it is this issue that we are trying to deal with and I thank the gentleman for his statement of support for the Vento amendment.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I would like to clear up a point. I have had a private conversation with our distinguished colleagues here. My opposition to this amendment at this point in no way indicates——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR) has again expired.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARRIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I simply want to clear up the point that this in no way precludes offering this amendment to our water bill at a later date. In fact, while I think it would not cure the water problem, if it were offered to the water bill at a later date, by it passing this would not carry with it the onerus problem of having passed coal slurry pipeline legislation; so I would want to assure the gentleman that my opposition at this point on this bill to this legislation in no way suggests that kind of opposition on a water bill.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments. I take back my time.

I just would like to say to the gentleman that I hope the gentleman is the only gentleman in the House who does not support the coal slurry pipeline legislation who will take the position of also not supporting this amendment.

I think it is a critical amendment. If we go to the Senate under any circumstances, I think we need this amendment on. If the Senate rips out this amendment, with the support of the pro-coal-slurry-pipeline people, I think when it comes back to the House in a conference report that it will be a significant limitation if this water amendment is not part of that final conference report.

I believe that the votes are here in the House to defeat the coal slurry pipeline if in fact the real serious flaw of this water issue is not corrected.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman show the Congress or this House any section, any paragraph, or any sentence in this bill that we are now debating that in any way subtracts from a right that a State has to regulate its water today, either an original State or a State that the water happens to pass through.

Where in this bill does it contain any provision that takes away the right that a State has today?

Mr. EDGAR. It is the absence of language in this bill that takes away the rights from downstate users of that water to control the capricious or extra use of water for a new purpose to the extreme.

There is nothing in the language of this bill that protects the State of Iowa or Nebraska or Missouri from the uses of the water upstream.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, does not the gentleman agree that those States downstream today would have the same rights that they had yesterday and before this bill was passed? Does this bill in any way change a right that they have today?

Mr. EDGAR. It absolutely does change the rights, because it uses water for a new purpose, and while the amount of water that may be used in the ETSI pipeline decision may be small, it does not preclude the additional use of water at larger quantities at some future time by additional pipelines that may, in fact, take water out of one watershed, move it to another, and the downstream States would have to go to the courts to get a remedy.

Mr. BREAUX. Is that not the situation that a downstream State has today?

Mr. EDGAR. Well, I am suggesting that if you are going to use water for a new purpose, that in the very language of the legislation you ought to protect those downstream States.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. VENTO, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EDGAR was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the bottom line on this bill is the clincher in the back, that in the event of any conflict between the provisions of this section and any other provisions of this act or any amendment made by this act or any other Federal law, the provisions of this section in this bill govern.

Now, if the gentleman does not think that affects any other rights or any other law, I think he is mistaken, to say nothing about what the impact might be on case law and other things that we associate with such rights, as a common shared surface body of water aquifer. Certainly insofar as they are not apportioned even on the basis of case law or judicial determination, they are dramatically impacted by the use of this water for this particular purpose.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, I think, would have to agree that the language that nothing in this act shall alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share is very powerful language.

It is simply not correct to say that the downstream States are worse off after the passage of this act than they were before. Their rights will be protected.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, let me just take back my time and say that I think the gentleman and I have a major disagreement over the amendment. I urge support of the Vento amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am opposed to this amendment for the many valid reasons that have already been stated. I note the gentleman from Montana has a very strong interest in this and, although I feel certain that I am not going to agree with either his statement or his conclusion, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his courtesy and generosity.

I join the chairman in his opposition to this amendment.

I say to my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota, that I hesitate to oppose the gentleman's amendment, just as I say to the two committee chairmen, I really hesitate to oppose the coal slurry bill. Frankly, I am neither here nor there on coal slurry.

They can build coal slurry lines in this country now and they do so. The question is why do they come to this Congress and ask for a coal slurry bill. The reason is simple. The State legislatures will not grant coal slurry the rights over State water, No. 1. No. 2, the State legislatures will not grant the companies the power of eminent domain. So these companies ask me and you to do that for them.

There are few issues more important to westerners, my State of Montana, or to Americans, than water and its use. This Nation has a long history of water dependence and that history has formed an intricate legal network of water law. This framework of water apportionment in interstate compacts has now, in my judgment, been jeopardized by the Sporhase against Nebraska decision. That decision had several troubling elements. The most notable were the jeopardizing of State water export bans, the recognition of water as a commodity, and therefore under the jurisdiction of the interstate commerce clause, and the vesting in Congress the sole right for water adjudication.

Now, my friends, let us say that we can plug this leaky coal slurry line. We all know that water is leaking from this line, and there are various amendments to try to patch the line here and there, to stop America's water from leaking out of coal slurry, to protect historic States rights over water. Let us say that we can do that. Let us say we can add band-aids on this coal slurry line to stop the water from leaking out. My question is why do it on this bill?

Why would the Congress want to do that on this bill? Why would the Congress for the first time step in and say for this one purpose, not hydroelectricity, not nuclear power, for this one system, coal slurry lines, the Congress will decide the beneficial use for water and we will solve the States rights over water for this one use, coal slurry.

That adds to the curious legislative history of this act.

Now, let me make one more point. It is very important in my judgment for the Members of this House to recognize that the primary purpose of this legislation is the facilitation of the development and construction and the operation of coal slurry pipelines. And therefore, that sole purpose is not reconcilable with any secondary purpose such as the protection of a State's water rights.

In order to facilitate coal slurry, all State laws of eminent domain, beneficial use of water and land, to name but a few, will be preempted so far as they relate to this legislation.

This Congress has experience with that. In the case back in 1946, a case called First Iowa Hydroelectric Cooperative against the Federal Power Commission, the Supreme Court held that, despite the specific provisions in the Federal Water Power Act protecting State laws from being superseded and requiring compliance with State procedures, Iowa's licensing requirements for dam construction and operation were preempted.

The purpose of this bill is to build coal slurry lines. If State water rights get in the way of that, Supreme Court history shows that the Supreme Court will come down on the side of building the coal slurry lines, not following the language that we have used to try to protect State water rights.

The history of the Supreme Court is clear on that my friends.

So, I say this to my friend from Minnesota, who joins with the other gentleman, including the gentleman from Wyoming, in trying to plug the leaks.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana and by unanimous consent, Mr. HOWARD was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Despite the attempts of these gentlemen, and there are many others, and when I was on the Interior Committee for 4 years I was one of them, trying to find a way to plug the leaks on this pipeline so that States' water would not leak out, despite our attempts, my friends, it cannot be done on this bill. This Congress should not be attempting to resolve the myriad of complex and extremely important water issues in this Nation on a bill to facilitate the operation and construction of coal slurry pipelines.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman is in opposition to this specific amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. The chairman is correct.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I wish to change my statement before and say I do agree with him.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. But I tell the chairman I am in opposition to the entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close at 3:15.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object.

Mr. Chairman, for some States the most important natural resource is coal. For others it is petroleum. For some States like Florida it may be weather or sunshine. For my State it is water, it is of incredible value to my State. I find it incredible, therefore, that I may not have an opportunity to speak at reasonable length on this bill.

At this point I would point out to the chairman, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) who I greatly respect, that only the members of the two authorizing committees have thus far had an opportunity to speak on their own time on this crucial amendment. And, therefore, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BEREUTER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close at 3:40.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairmen of the two relevant authorizing committees how many other members of their committees intend to request time on their own so that I might have some opportunity to estimate whether or not I will receive at least 5 to 6 minutes.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I had consulted briefly with the leadership on the other side and I thought it was generally agreed. Looking around I suspect there will be 2 or 3 minutes available for each of the members, some of whom have been here for a long time trying to get heard.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HOWARD. As far as my committee is concerned I see only two members of our committee standing.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN) under that reservation.
